The Death of Robert Earl of Huntington

[by Anthony Munday]

1601

This facsimile is from an original copy in the British Museum. There are other examples in Bodley and at South Kensington (Dyce).

For what is known of Munday see the "D.N.B.," but as I have already pointed out the bibliography there given of the subject of the memoir is not always accurate.

The present reproduction is, subject to the usual limitations of collotype, very well done indeed. Here and there is observable the barest tendency to excess in tone, but beyond that there is little, if anything, on which to remark.

Notingham, Lord high Admirall of England, his ſervants.

THE DEATH OF ROBERT, EARLE OF HVNTINGTON.

¶ Enter Frier Tucke.

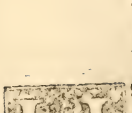
SCEANE. I.

Frier.



Olla, holla, holla: follow, follow, follow. Like noyse within. Now benedicite, what fowle absurditie, follie, foolerie had like to followed mee? I & my mates, like addle pates, inuiting great States, to see our last play, are hunting the hay, with ho, that way, the goodly Heart ranne, with followe little Iohn, Much play the man; and I, like a sot, haue wholly forgot the course of our plot: but crosse-bowe ipe downe, come on Friers gowne, hoode couer my crowne, and with a lowe becke, preuent a sharpe checke.

Blithe sit yee all, and winke at our rude cry,
Hinde where wee left, in Sheerewod merrily,
The king, his traine, Robin, his yeomen tall
Gone to the woode to see the fat deare fall:
And prettie Iinny looking, euery howre,

For their returning from the hunting game,
And therefore seeke to set each thing in frame.
Warman all wofull for his sinne we left.
Sir Doncaster, whose villanies and theft,
You neuer heard of, but too soone yee shall,
Hurt with the Prior; shame them both befall,
Whey two will make our mirth be short and small.
But least I tying yee sorrowe ere the time,
Pardon I beg of your well iudging eyne,
And take in part bad prologue, and rude play:
The hunters holloo, Tucke must needes away.
Therefore downe weede, howe doe the deede, to make the Stagge bleede, and if my hand speede, hey for a cry, to a throate strained hie, & a lowde pall, at the beasts fall. Exit. Holloo within

Enter King, Ely, Fitzwater, Salsbury, Chester,
Prince John, little John, Scathlocke.

Kin. Where is our mother?
Pr. John. Mounted in a stand.
Sir fallowe deere haue dyed by her hand.
Fitz. Three Stags I slewe.
Ely. Two Bucks by me fell downe.
Chest. As many dyed by mee.
Salf. But I had three.
Prin. Scathlocke, wheres Much?
Sca. When last I saw him, may it please your Grace,
He and the Frier footed it apace.
Prin. Scathlocke, no Grace, your fellowe & plaine Iohn.
Lit. Ioh. I warrant you, Much will behere anone.
Pr. Thinkst thou little Iohn, that he must linny wed?
Lit. Ioh. No doubt he must.
Prin. Then to adorne his head, we shall haue hornes good store.
King. God, for thy grace,

How

How could I misse the Stagge I had in chase?
Twice did I hit him in the very necke,
When backe my arrowes flewe, as they had smit
On some sure armour. Where is Robin Hood,
And ỳ wighte Scarlet? Seeke them little Iohn. Exit Ioh.
I le haue that Stagge before I dine to day.

¶ Enter Much.

Much. O the frier, the frier, the frier.

King. Why, how now Much?

Cry ye mercy, master king. Marry this is the matter; Scarlet is following the Stagge you hit, and has almost lodg'd him: now the Frier has the best bowe, but yours, in all the field: which and Scarlet had, he would haue him straight.

Kin. Where is thy master?

Much. Nay, I cannot tell, nor the Frier neither.

Scath. I heare them holloo, farre off in the wod.

King. Come Much, canst lead vs where as Scarlet is?

Muc. Neuer feare you; follow me. Exeunt, hollooing.

SCEANE, II.

¶ Enter sir Doncaster, Prior.

Don. You were resolued to haue him poysoned,
Or kild, or made away, you car'd not how.
What thuell makes you doubtfull now to doo't?

Pri. Why Doncaster? his kindnesse in our needes.

Don. A plague vpon his kindnesse, let him die.
I neuer temperd poyson in my life, but I imployd it.
By th'masse and I loose this,
For euer looke to loose my company.

Pri. But will you giue it him?

Don. That cannot bee.
The Queene, Earle Chester, and Earle Salisbury,
If they once see mee, I am a deade man:

Or did they heare my name, Ile lay my life,
They all would hunt me, for my life.
Pri. What hast thou done to them?
Don. Faith, some odde toyes,
That made me fly the south: but passe wee them:
Here is the poyson: will you giue it Robin?
Pri. Now by this gold I will.
Don. Or as I said, for euer I desire your company.
Pri. Well, he shall die, and in his follity:
And in my head I haue a policy
To make him die disgrac't.
Don. O tell it Prior.
Pri. I will, but not as now: Call the Frier within.
Weele seeke a place, the woods haue many eares,
And some me thinkes are calling for the Frier. Exeunt.

SCEANE. III.

¶ Enter, calling the Frier, as afore.

Ioh. The Frier, the Frier?
Scath. Why, where's this Frier?
Fri. Here sir. what is your desire?

¶ Enter Robin Hoode.

Rob. Why Frier, what a murren dost thou meane?
The King cals for thee. For, a mighty stagge,
(That hath a copper ring about his necke,
With letters on it, which hee would haue read)
Hath Scarlet kild. I pray thee goe thy way.
Fri. Master I will, no longer will I stay. Exit.
Rob. Good vnkle be more carefull of your health,
And you sir Doncaster, your wounds are greene.
Both. Through your great kindnes, we are cõforted.
Rob. And Warman, I aduise you to more mirth.
Shun solitary walkes, keepe company,
Forget your fault: I haue forgiuen the fault.
Good Warman be more blithe, and at this time,
A little helpe my Marian and her maide:

Much

much shall come to you straight: a little now,
We must al striue to doe the best we may. Exit, winding.
War. On you and her Ile waite, vntill my dying day.
Exeunt, and as they are going out, Doncaster puls Warman.
Don. Warman a word. My good Lord Prior and I
Are full of griefe, to see thy misery.
War. My misery, sir Doncaster? why? I thanke God,
I neuer was in better state than now.
Pri. Why, what a seruile slauish minde hast thou?
Art thou a man, and canst be such a beast,
Alle-like to beare the burthen of thy wrong?
War. What wrong haue I? Ist wrong to be releiu'd?
Don. Releiu'd saist thou?
Why, shallow witted foole,
Dost thou not see Robins ambitious pride?
And how he clymes by pittying, and aspires,
By humble lookes, good deedes, and such fond topes,
To be a monarch, raigning ouer vs,
As if wee were the vassals to his will?
War. I am his vassall, and I will be still.
Pri. Warman, thou art a foole. I doe confesse,
Were these good deedes done in sincerittie,
Pittie of minde, thine or this knights distresse,
Without vaine bragg, it were true charitie:
But to releiue our fainting bodies wants,
And grieue our soules with quippes, and bitter braids,
Is good turnes ouerturnd: no thanks wee owe
To any, whatsoeuer helps vs so.
War. Neither himselfe, nor any that hee keepes,
Euer vpbraided mee, since I came last.
Don. O God haue mercie on thee, silly asse.
Doth he not say to euery guest that comes;
This same is Warman, that was once my steward?
War. And what of that?

Pri. Ile not as much to say:
Why, here he stands that once did mee betray.
Don. Did hee not bring a troope to grace himselfe,
Like Captiues waiting on a conquerours chaire,
And calling of them out, by one and one,
Presented them, like fairings, to the king?
Pri. O, I there was a rare inuention:
A plague vpon the foole.
I hate him worse for that than all the rest.
War. Why should you hate him? why should you or you,
Enuie this noble Lord, thus as you doe?
Don. Nay rather, why dost thou not ioyne in hate
With vs, that lately liu'dst like vs, in wealthy state?
Remember this, remember foolish man,
How thou hast beene the Shrieue of Nottingham.
Pri. Cry to thy thoughts, let this thought neuer cease,
I haue beene Iustice of my Soueraignes peace,
Lord of faire liuings: men with cap and knee,
In liueries waited howerly on mee.
Don. And when thou thinkst, thou hast beene such a such,
Thinke then what tis to be a mate to Much,
To runne when Robin bids, come at his call,
Be mistresse Marians man.
Pri. May thinke withall
War. What shall I thinke? but thinke vpon my need,
When men fed dogs, and me they would not feede:
When I despaird through want, and sought to die,
My pitious master, of his charitie,
Forgaue my fault, relieu'd and saued mee:
This doe I thinke vpon, and you should thinke
(If you had hope of soules saluation)
First Prior, that he is of thy flesh and bloode,
That thou art vnkle vnto Robin Hoode:
That by extortion thou dost get his lands:
God, and I know how it came to thy hands:

How

How thou purſu'dſt him in his miſery,
And how heauen plagu'd thy hearts extreamitie:
Thinke Doncaſter, when, hyred by this Priour,
Thou cam'ſt to take my maſter with the Frier,
And wert thy ſelfe tane, how he let thee free,
Gaue thee an hundred pound to comfort thee,
And both bethinke yee how but yeſterday,
Wounded and naked in the fielde you lay,
How with his owne hand he did raiſe your heads,
Powrd balme into your wounds, your bodies fed,
Watcht when yee ſlept, wept when he ſawe your woe,
Don. Stay Warman, ſtay: I graunt that he did ſo,
And you, turnd honeſt, haue ſoſworne the villaine:
War. Euen from my ſoule, I villany deſie.
Pri. A bleſſed hower: a fit time now to die:
Don. And you ſhall, Conſcience. Stab him, he fals.
War. O forgiue mee, God,
And ſaue my maſter from their bloodie handes.
Pri. What, haſt thou made him ſure?
Don Its deade ſure: he is dead, if that be ſure.
Pri. Then let vs thruſt the dagger in his hand,
And when the next comes, cry he kild himſelfe.
Don. That muſt be now: ponder comes Robin Hood.
No life in him.
Pri. No, no, not any life.
Three mortall wounds haue let in piercing aire,
And at their gaps, his life is cleane let out.
Rob. Who is it vncle that you ſo bemone?
Pri. Warman, good nephew, whom ſir Doncaſter & I
Found freſhly bleeding, as he now doth lye.
You were ſcarce gone, when he did ſtab himſelfe.
Ro. O God, he in his own hand houlds his own harts
I dreaded too much his diſtreſſed looke: (hurt,
Belike the wretch deſpaird, and ſlewe himſelfe.
Don. Nay, thats moſt ſure, yet he had little reaſon,

Considering how well you vled him.
Rob. Well, I am sorie: but must not be sad,
Because the king is comming to my bower.
Helpe mee. I pray thee, to remoove his bodie,
Least he should come and see him murdered.
Sometime anone he shall be buried. Exit.
Pri. Good, all is good: this is as I desire,
Now for a face of pure hypocrisie:
Sweete murder, cloath thee in religious weedes,
Raigne in my bosome, that with helpe of thee,
I may effect this Robins Tragedie.
¶ Enter Robin, Doncaster.
Do. Nay, nay, you must not take this thing so heauily.
Rob. A bodies losse, sir Doncaster, is much:
But a soules too, is more to be bemon'd.
Pri. Truly I wonder at your vertuous minde:
O God to one so kinde, who'ud be vnkinde!
Let goe this griefe, now must you put on ioy,
And for the many fauours I haue found,
So much exceeding all conceipt of mine,
Unto your cheere, Ile adde a pretious drinke,
Of colour rich, and red, sent mee from Rome,
There's in it Moly, Syrian Ballamum,
Golds rich Elixer: O tis pretious!
Rob. Where is it vncle?
Pri. As yesterday,
Sir Doncaster and I rid on our way,
Theeues did beset vs, bound vs as you saw:
And among other things, did take from mee,
This rich confection: but regardlesly,
As common drinke, they cast, into a bush,
The bottle, which this day sir Doncaster
Fetcht, and hath left it in the inner lodging:
I tell you coslin (I doe loue you well)
A pint of this ransomde the Sophies sonne,

When

When he was taken in Natolia,
I meant indeede to giue it my liege Lord,
In hope to haue his fauour: but to you
I put my selfe, be my good friend,
And, in your owne reckoning, mee reckore.
Rob. Unkle I will, you neede vrge that no more.
But whats the vertues of this pretious drinke?
Pri. It keepes freth youth, reckores diseased sight.
Helps natures weakenesse, smothes the scars of woūds,
And cooles the intrals with a balmie breath,
When they by thirst or trauell boyle with heate.
Rob. Unkle I thanke you, pray you let me haue
A cuppe prepared, gainst the king comes in,
To coole his heate my selfe will giue it him.
Pri. And when he drinkes, be bold to say he drinkes
A richer draught than that dissolued pearle,
Which Cleopatra drancke to Antonie.
Rob. I haue much businesse; let it be your charge,
To make this rich draught ready for the King,
And I will quit it, pray yee doe not faile. Exit.
Pri. I warrant you, good Nephew.
Don. Better, and better still.
We thought before but to haue poysond him,
And now shall Robin Hoode destroy the king.
Euen when the King, & Queene, the Prince, the Lords
Joy in his vertues, this supposed vice
Will turne, to sharpe hate, their exceeding loue.
Pri. Ha, ha, ha, I cannot chuse but laugh,
To see my cosin cosend in this sort.
Faile him quoth you? nay hang mee if I doe.
But Doncaster art sure the poysons are well mixt?
Don. Tut, tut, let me alone for poysoning:
I haue already turnd ore foure, or fiue,
That angerd mee. But tell mee Prior,
Wherefore so deadly dost thou hate thy cosin?

Pri. Shall I be plaine? Becauſe if he were deade,
I ſhould be made the Earle of Huntington.
Don. A prettie cauſe: But thou a church-man art.
Pri. Tut man, if that would fall,
Ile haue a diſpenſation, and turne temporall.
But tell mee Doncaſter, why doſt thou hate him?
Don. By the Maſſe, I cannot tel. O yes, now I ha't,
I hate thy couſin, Earle of Huntington,
Becauſe ſo many loue him as there doe,
And I my ſelfe am loued of ſo fewe.
Nay, I haue other reaſons for my hate;
Hee is a foole, and will be reconcilde,
To anie foe hee hath: he is too milde,
Too honeſt for this world, fitter for heauen:
Hee will not kill theſe greedie cormorants,
Nor ſtrippe baſe peſants of the wealth they haue:
He does abuſe a thieues name and an outlawes,
And is indeede no outlawe, nor no theefe,
He is vnworthy of ſuch reuerent names.
Beſides, he keepes a paltry whining girle,
And will not bed, forſooth, before he bride:
Ile ſtand too't, he abuſes maidenhead,
That will not take it, being offered:
Hinders the common wealth of able men.
Another thing I hate him for againe:
He ſaies his prayers, faſts eues, giues alms, does good:
For theſe and ſuch like crimes, ſweares Doncaſter,
To worke the ſpeedie death of Robin Hoode.
Pri. Well ſaid yfaith. Harke, hark, the king returns:
To doe this deede, my heart like fuel burns. Exeunt.

SCEANE. IIII.

¶ Winde hornes. Enter King, Queene, Iohn, Fitzwater, Ely, Cheſter, Salſbury, Leſter, little Iohn, Frier Tuck, Scarlet, Scathlocke, and Much, Frier Tuck carrying a Stags head, dauncing.

King.

King. Gramercy Frier for thy glee,
Thou greatly hast contented mee,
What with thy sporting and thy game,
I sweare I highly pleased am.
Fri. It was my masters whole desire
That maiden, yeoman, swaine and frier
Their arts and wits should all apply,
For pleasure of your Maiestie.
Qu. Sonne Richard, looke I pray you on the ring,
That was about the necke of the last stagge.
Chest. Was his name Scarler, that shot off his necke?
Iohn. Chester, it was this honest fellow Scarlet:
This is the fellowe, and a yeoman bold,
As euer court the swift Hart on the molde.
King. Frier, heres somewhat graun'd vpon the Ring.
I pray thee reade it. Peace while I list to mee;
This while, mest compassing the Frier about the Ring.
Scarlet and Scathlock, you bold brethren,
Twelue pence a day I giue each for his fee,
And henceforth see yee liue like honest men.
Both. We will my Liege, else let vs dye the death.
Much. A boone, a boone, vpon my knee,
Good king Richard, I begge of thee.
For indeede sir, the troth is, much is my father, and hee is one of your tenants in Kings Mill at Wakefield all on a greene: & there dwelleth a iolly pinder, at Wakefield all on a greene: Now I would haue you, if you will doe so much for mee, to set mee forward in the way of marriage to Inny: the mill would not be cast away vpon vs.
King. Much, be thou euer master of that mill,
I giue it thee for thine inheritance.
Much. Thanks prettious Prince of curtesie.
Ile to Inny, and tell her of my lands plaith. Exit
Iob. Here Frier, here, here it begins,

Fri. read. When Harold hare-foote raigned king,
About my necke he put this ring.
King. In Harolds time, moze than a hundzed yeare,
Hath this ring bene about this newe slaine Deere!
I am sozy now it dyde: but let the same
Head, ring and all be sent to Notingham,
And in the Castle kept foz monuments.
Fitz. My Liege, I heard an olde tale long agoe,
That Harold being Goodwins sonne of Kent,
When he had got faire Englands gouernment,
Hunted foz pleasure once within this wood,
And singled out a faire and stately Stagge,
Which foote to foote, the king in running caught:
And sure this was the Stagge.
King. It was no doubt.
Chest. But some my Lozd affirme,
That Iulius Cæsar many yeares befoze,
Tooke such a Stag, and such a Poesie wzit.
King. It should not be in Iulius Cæsars time:
There was no English vsed in this Land,
Untill the Saxons came, and this is wzit
In Saxon characters.
Ioh. Well, 'twas a goodly beast.

¶ Enter Robin Hoode.

King. How now earle Robert?
Fri. A fozfet, a fozfet, my liege Lozd.
My masters lawes are on recozd,
The Court-roll here your Grace may see.
King. I pzay thee Frier, read them mee.
Fri. One shall suffice, and this is hee.
No man that commeth in this wod,
To feast, oz dwell with Robin Hood,
Shall call him Earle, Lozd, Knight, oz Squire,
Be no such titles doth desire,
But Robin Hood, plaine Robin Hoode,

That

That honeſt yeoman ſtout and good,
On paine of forfetting a marke,
That muſt be paid to mee his Clarke,
My liege, my liege, this lawe you broke,
Almoſt in the laſt word you ſpoke.
That crime may not acquited bee,
Till Frier Tuck receiue his fee. (Caſts him purſe.

King. Theres more than twenty marks, mad Frier.

Fri. If thus you pay ỳ Clarke his hire,
Oft may you forfet, I deſire.
You are a perfect penitent,
And well you doe your wrong repent:
For this your Highneſſe liberall gift,
I here abſolue you without ſhrift.

King. Gramercies Frier. Now Robin Hood,
Sith Robin Hood it needes muſt bee,
I was about to aſke before,
If thou didſt ſee the great Stags fall.

Rob. I did my Lord, I ſawe it all.
But miſſing this ſame prating Frier,
And hearing you ſo much deſire
To haue the forels companie,
I went to ſeeke Small honeſtie.

Fri. But you found much, when you found mee.

Rob. I, Much my man: but not a iot
Of honeſtie in thee, God wot.

Qu. Robin, you doe abuſe the Frier.

Fri. Madam, I dare not call him lyer,
He may be bold with mee, he knowes.
How now Prince Iohn, how goes, how goes
This wood-mans life with you to day?
My fellow Wodnet you would bee.

Iob. I am thy fellowe, thou doſt ſee:
And to be plaine, as God me ſaue,
So well I like thee, merry knaue,

That I thy company muſt haue?
Nay, and I will.
Fri. Nay, and you ſhall.
Rob. My Lord, you needs not feare at all,
But you ſhall haue his company,
He will be bold I warrant you.
King. Know you where ere a ſpring is nie?
Faine would I drink, I am right dry.
Rob. I haue a drinke within my bower,
Of pleaſing taſte, and ſoueraigne power:
My reuerend vncle giues it mee,
To giue vnto your Maieſtie.
King. I would be loath indeede, being in heate,
To drinke cold water. Let vs to thy bower,
Ro. Runne Frier before, & bid my vnkle be in readines.
Fr. Con ẅ a trice, on ſuch good buſineſſe. Exeũt omnes.

SCEANE, V.

¶ Enter Marian, with a white apron.

Mar. What Much? What Iinny? Much? I ſay.
Much. Whats the matter miſtreſſe?
Mar. I pray thee ſee, the fueller
Suffer the cooke to want no wodde.
Good Lord, where is this idle girle?
Why Iinny?
Within. I come forſooth.
Mar. I pray thee bring the flowers forth.
Much. Ile goe ſend her miſtres, and help the cookes, if they haue any neede. Exit much.
Mar. Diſpatch good much. What Iin I ſay?

¶ Enter Iinny.

Much. Hie yee, hie yee: the cals for life.
Mar. Indeede, indeede, you doe me wrong,
To let me cry, and call ſo long.

Iinny

Iin. Forsooth, I strawed the dining bowers.
And smoth'd the walkes with hearbes & flowers,
The yeomens tables I haue spred,
Drest salts, laid trenchers, set on bread:
Nay all is well, I warrant you.
Mar. You are not well I promise you,
Your foresleeues are not pind (fie, fie)
And all your hed-geere stands awry.
Giue me the flowers: Goe in for shame,
And quickly see you mend the same. Exit Iinny.
Marian strewing flowers. Enter sir Doncaster, Prior.
Don. How busie mistresse Marian is?
She thinkes this is her day of blisse.
Pri. But it shall be the wofull'st day
That euer chaunst her, if I may.
Mar. Why are you two thus in the ayre?
Your wounds are greene,
Good cuz haue care.
Pri. Thanks for your kindnesse, gentle maid.
My cosin Robert vs hath praid,
To helpe him in this businesse.
¶ Enter Frier.
Fri. Sir Doncaster, sir Doncaster?
Don. Holla.
Fri. I pray you, did you see the Prior?
Pri. Why, here I am. What wouldst thou Frier.
Fri. The king is heated in the chace,
And posteth hitherward apace.
He told my master he was dry,
And hee desires ye, presently
To send the drinke whereof ye spake. Hornes blowe.
Pri. Come, it is here; haste let vs make Exeunt Prior, and Frier.
¶ Enter King, Iohn, Queene, Scarlet, Scathlocke, Ely, Fitzwater, Salsbury, Chester. Marian kneeles downe.

Mar. Moſt gratious Soueraigne, welcome once againe:
Welcome to you, and all your princely traine.
King. Thanks louely hoſteſſe: we are homely gueſts.
Wheres Robin Hood? He promiſed me ſome drinke.
Mar. Your handmaid, Robin will not then be long,
The Frier indeede came running to his bunke,
Who with sir Doncaſter were here with mee,
And altogether went for ſuch a drinke.
Kin. Well, in a better time it could not come.
For I am very hot and paſſing dry.
¶ Enter Robin Hoode, a cuppe, a towell, leading Doncaſter: Tuck, and Much pulling the Prior.
Rob. Traitor, Ile draw thee out before the king.
Fri. Come murderous Pryor.
Much. Come yee dogges face.
Ki Why how now Robin? wheres my drink you bring?
Rob. Lay holde on theſe.
Farre be it, I ſhould bring your Maieſtie,
The drinke theſe two prepared for your taſte.
King. Why Robin Hoode, be briefe and anſwere mee:
I am amazed at thy troubled lookes.
Rob. Long will not my ill lookes amaze your Grace.
I ſhortly looke, never to looke againe.
Mar. Never to looke? What will it ſtill be night?
If thou looke never, day can never be.
What ailes my Robin? Wherefore doſt thou faint?
Rob. Becauſe I cannot ſtand: yet now I can.
Thanks to my king, and thanks to Marian.
King. Robin be briefe, and tell vs what hath chanſt?
Rob. I muſt be briefe, for I am ſure of death,
Before a long tale can be halfe way tolde.
Fitz. Of death, my ſonne? bright ſunne of all my ioy?
Death cannot haue the power of vertuous life.
Rob. Not of the vertues, but the life it ſan. (die?
King. What doſt thou ſpeak of death? how ſhouldſt thou

Rob

Rob. By poiſon, and the Priors treachery.
Qu. Why, take this ſouraigne powder at my hãds,
Take it and liue in ſpite of poyſons power.
Don. I, let him forward. Powders quoth ye? hah,
I am a foole then, ſi'a little dull,
The ſhauing of a horne, a Bezars ſtone,
Or any Antidote haue power to ſtay
The execution of my hearts reſolue.
Tut, tut, you labour lonely Queene, in vaine,
And on a thankleſſe groome your toyle beſtowe,
How hath your foe reueng'd you of your foe:
Robin ſhall die, if all the world ſayd no.
Mar. How the Wolfe howles! Fly like a tender Kid
Into thy sheepeheards boſome. Shield mee loue.
Canſt thou not Robin? Where ſhall I be hid?
O God, theſe Rauens will ſeaze vpon thy Doue.
Rob. They cannot hurt thee, pray thee doe not feare,
Baſe curres will couch, the Lyon being neare,
Qu. How workes my powder?
Rob. Very well, faire Queene.
King. Doſt thou feele any eaſe?
Rob. I ſhall, I truſt, anone.
Sleepe ſals vpon mine eyes.
O I muſt ſleepe, & they that loue me, do not waken me.
Mar. Sleepe in my lap, and I will ſing to thee.
Ioh. He ſhould not ſleepe.
Rob. I muſt, for I muſt die:
While I liue therfore let me haue ſome reſt.
Fitz. I, let him reſt, the poyſon vrges ſleepe.
When he awakes, there is no hope of life.
Don. Of life? now by the little time I haue to liue,
He cannot liue one hower for your liues.
King. Villaine what art thou?
Don. Why, I am a knight.
Cheſt. Thou wert indeede.

If it to pleaſe your Grace,
I will deſcribe my knowledge of this wretch.
Kin. Doe Cheſter.
Cheſt. This Doncaſter, for ſo the fellon hight,
Was, by the king your father, made a knight,
And well in armes he did himſelfe behaue,
Many a bitter ſtorme, the winde of rage
Blaſted this Realme with, in thoſe woful daies,
Betweene your kingly father and his ſonnes.
This cut-throat, knighted in that time of woe,
Seaz'd on a beautious Nunne, at Barkhamſted,
As wee were marching toward Wincheſter,
After proud Lincolne was compeld to yeild,
Hee tooke this virgine straying in the field:
For all the Nunnes and euery Couent fled
The daungers that attended on our troopes.
For thoſe ſad times too oft did teſtifie,
Mars rage hath no regard of pietie,
She humbly praid him, for the loue of heauen,
To guid her to her fathers, two miles thence.
He ſwore he would, and very well he might:
For to the campe he was a Forager.
Vpon the way they came into a wood,
Wherein, in briefe, he ſtript this tender maid:
Whoſe luſt, when he in vaine had long withſtood,
Being by ſtrength and torments ouer laid,
He did a ſacrilegious deede of rape,
And left her bath'd in her owne teares and blood.
When ſhe reuiu'd, ſhe to her fathers got,
And got her father to make luſt complaint,
Vnto your mother, being then in campe.
Qu. Is this the villaine Cheſter, that deſtroyde
Sir Euſtace Stutuiles chaſt and beautious childe?
Don. I Madam, this is hee,

That

That made a wench daunce naked in a wood:
And for thee did denie what I deſirde,
I ſcourg'd her for her pride, till her faire ſkinne
With ſtripes was checkred like a buttners grate.
And what was this? I might matter ſure,
I haue a thouſand more than ſhe deſirde,
And cut the ſqueaking throats of ſome of them:
I grieue I did not hirs,
Qu. Punish him Richard.
A fairer virgine neuer ſawe the ſunne.
A chaſter maid was neuer ſworne a Nunne.
King. How ſcap't the villaine punishment, that time?
Fitz. I rent his ſpurres off, and diſgraded him.
Cheſt. And then he raild vpon the Queene and mee.
Being committed, he his keeper ſlue,
And to your father fled, who pardond him.
Rich. God giue his ſoule a pardon for that ſinne,
Sall. O had I heard his name, or ſeene his face,
I had defended Robin from this chance.
Ah villaine, that thoſe gloomy lights of thine.
Remember'ſt thou a little ſonne of mine,
Whoſe nurſe at Wilton firſt thou rauiſhedſt,
And ſlew'ſt two maids that did attend on them?
Don. I grant, I dasht the braines out of a brat,
Thine if he were, I care not: had he bin
The firſt borne comfort of a royall king,
And ſhould haue pald when Doncaſter cried peace,
I would haue done by him as then I did.
King. Soone ſhall the world be rid of ſuch a wretch,
Let him be hangd aliue, in the high way, that ioyneth to the power.
Don. Aliue or deade, I reck not how I die.
You, them, and theſe, I deſperately defie.
Ely. Repent, or neuer looke to be abſolu'd,
But die accurſt as thou deſerueſt well.

Don. Then giue me my desert; curse one by one.
Ely. First I accurse thee, and, if thou persist,
Unto damnation leaue thee wretched man.
Don. What doe I care for your damnation?
Am I not doom'd to death? what more damnation
Can there insue your loud and yelling cryes?
Pri. Yes diuell: heare thy fellowe spirit speake,
Who would repent; O faine he would repent,
After this bodies bitter punishment,
There is an euer-during endlesse woe,
A quenchlesse fire, an vnconsuming paine,
Which desperate soules and bodies must indure.
Don. Can you preach this, yet set me on sir Prior,
To runne into this endlesse, quenchlesse fier?
Pri. High heauens shewe mercie to my many ils.
Neuer had this bene done, but like a fiend,
Thou temptedst me with ceaselesse diuelish thoughts.
Therefore I curse, with bitternesse of soule,
The bower wherein I saw thy balefull eyes.
My eyes I curse, for looking on those eyes.
My eares I curse, for harkning to thy tongue.
I curse thy tongue for tempting of myne eares.
Each part I curse, that wee call thine or mine:
Thine for enticing mine, mine following thine.
Don. A holy prayer. what Collect haue we next?
This time Robin stirres.
Fitz. My Marian wanteth words, such is her woe:
But old Fitzwater for his girle and him
Begs nothing, but worlds plague for such a foe,
Which causelesse harmd a vertuous noble man,
A pitier of his griefes, when he felt griefe:
Therefore bethinke thee of thy batefull deede,
Thou faithlesse Prior, and thou this ruthlesse theefe.
Pri. Will no man curse me, giuing so much cause?
Then Doncaster, our selues our selues accurse,

And

And let no good betide to thee or mee.
All the yeomen, Frier, Much, Iinny cry;
All. Amen, amen: accurſed may ye bee,
For murdring Robin, flower of curteſie.
Robin ſits vp.
Rob. O ring not ſuch a peale for Robins death,
Let ſweete forgiuenelle be my paſſing bell.
Art thou there Marian? then ſly forth my breath:
To die within thy armes contents me well.
Pri. Keepe in, keepe in a little while thy ſoule,
Till I haue powr'd my ſoule forth at thy feete.
Rob. I ſlept not vnkle, I pour griefe did heare,
Let him forgiue your ſoule that bought it deare:
Your bodies deede, I in my death forgiue,
And humbly begge the king that you may liue.
Stand to your Cleargie vnkle, ſaue your life,
And lead a better life than you haue done.
Pri. O gentle Nephew, eh my brothers ſonne,
Thou dying glory of old Huntington,
Wiſheſt thou life to ſuch a murdrous foe?
I will not liue, ſith thou muſt life forgoe.
Oh happie Warman, bleſſed in thy end,
Now too too late thy truth I doe commend.
O Nephew, Nephew, Doncaſter and I
Murdred poore Warman, for he did denie
To ioyne with vs in this blacke tragedy.
Rob. Alas poore Warman. Frier, little Iohn,
I told ye both where Warmans bodie lay:
And of his buriall Ile diſpoſe anone.
King. Is there no lawe, Lord Ely, to conuict,
This Prior, that confeſſeth murders thus?
Ely. He is a hallowed man, and muſt be tried,
And puniſht by the cenſure of the Church.
Pri. The Church therein doth erre: God doth allowe
No Canon to preſerue a murderers life.

Richard, king Richard, in thy Grandsires daies,
A law was made, the Clergie swore thereto,
That whatsoeuer Church-man did commit
Treason, or murder, or false felonie,
Should like a seculer be punished.
Treason we did, for sure we did intend
King Richards poisoning, Soueraigne of this land.
Murder we did in working Warmans end,
And my deare Nephewes, by this fatall hand.
And theft we did, for we haue robd the king,
The State, the Nobles, Commons, and his men,
Of a true Peere, firme Piller, liberall Lord.
Fitzwater we haue robd of a kinde sonne,
And Marians loue-lopes we haue quite vndoone.
Don. Whoppe, what a coyle is here wth your confession?
Pri. I aske but iudgement for my foule transgression.
King. Thy own mouth hath condemned thee.
Hence with him.
Hang this man dead, then see him buried:
But let the other hang aline in chaines.
Don. I thanke you sir.
Exeunt yeomen, Frier, prisoners, & Much.
Iohn. My selfe will goe, my Lord,
And see sharpe Iustice done vpon these slaues.
Rob. O goe not hence Prince Iohn: a word or two Before I die, I faine would say to you.
King. Robin, wee see what we are sad to see,
Death like a champion treading downe thy life:
Yet in thy end somwhat to comfort thee,
Wee freely giue to thy betrothed wife,
Beautious and chast Matilda, all those lands,
Faine by thy folly, to the Priors hands,
And by his fault now forfeited to mee:
Earle Huntington, she shall thy Countesse bee,
And thy wight yeomen, they shall wend with mee,

Against

Againſt the faithleſſe enemies of Chriſt.
Rob. Bring forth a Beere, and couer it with greene.
A Beere is brought in.
That on my death-bed I may here ſit downe.
Beere brought, he ſits.
At Robins buriall let no blacke be ſeene,
Let no hand giue for him a mourning gowne:
For in his death, his king hath giuen him life,
By this large gift, giuen to his maiden wife.
Chaſte maid Marilda, Counteſſe of account,
Chaſe, with thy bright eyes, all theſe clouds of woe,
From theſe faire cheekes, I pray thee ſweete do ſo.
Thinke it is booteleſſe folly, to complaine,
For that which neuer can be had againe.
Queene Elianor, you once were Matilds foe:
Prince Iohn, you long ſought her vnlawfull loue:
Let dying Robin Hood intreat you both,
To change thoſe paſſions Madame turne your hate,
To princely loue; Prince Iohn, conuert your loue
To vertuous paſſions, chaſt and moderate.
O that your gratious right hands would infolde,
Matildas right hand, priſoned in my palme,
And ſweare to doe what Robin Hood deſires.
Qu. I ſweare I will, I will a mother be,
To faire Matildas life and chaſtitie.
Ioh. When Iohn ſolicites chaſt Matildaes eares,
With lawleſſe ſuites, as he hath often done:
Or offers to the altars of her eyes,
Laſciuious Poems, ſtuft with vanities,
He craues to ſee but ſhort and ſower daies,
His death be like to Robins he deſires,
His periur'd body proue a poyſoned prey,
For cowled Monkes, and barefoote begging Friers.
Rob. Inough, inough, Fitzwater, take your child:
My dying breſt which no ſunnes heat can thawe,

Cloſes the powers of all my outward parts,
My freezing blood runnes backe vnto my heart,
Where it aſſiſts death, which it would reſiſt:
Only my loue a little hinders death.
For he beholds her eyes, and cannot ſmite:
Then goe not yet Matilda, ſtay a while.
Frier, make ſpeede, and litt my laſt will.
Mat. O let mee looke, for euer in thy eyes,
And lay my warme breath to thy bloodleſſe lips,
If my light can reſtraine deaths tyrannies,
Or keepe liues breath within thy boſome locke.
Rob. Away, away,
For beare, my loue: all this is but delay.
Fitz. Come maiden daughter, from my maiden ſonne,
And giue him leaue to doe what muſt be done.
Rob. Firſt I bequeath my ſoule to all ſoules ſauer,
And will my bodie to be buried,
At Wakefield, vnderneath the Abbey wall:
And in this order make my funerall;
When I am dead, ſtretch me vpon this Beere,
My beades and Primer ſhall my pillowe bee:
On this ſide lay my bowe, my good ſhafts here,
Vpon my breſt the croſſe, and vnderneath,
My truſtie ſwoorde, thus faſtned in the ſheath.
Let Warmans bodie at my feete be laid,
Poore Warman, that in my defence did die,
For holy dirges, ſing me woomens ſongs,
As ye to Wakefield walke, with voices ſhrill:
This for my ſelfe: my goods and plate I giue
Among my peomen: them I doe beſtowe,
Vpon my Soueraigne, Richard. This is all.
My liege farewell, my loue farewell, farewell.
Farewell faire Queene, Prince Iohn and noble Lords.
Father Fitzwater heartily adieu,
Adieu my peomen tall.

Mat.

Matilda close mine eyes.
Frier farewell, farewell to all.
Mat. O must my hands with enuious death conspire,
To shut the morning gates of my liues light?
Fitz. It is a duetie, and thy loues desire,
Ile helpe thee girle to close up Robins sight.
King. Laments are bootelesse, teares cannot restore
Lost life: Matilda, therefore weepe no more.
And since our mirth is turned into mone,
Our merry sport, to tragick funerall,
Wee will prepare our power for Austria,
After earle Roberts timelesse buriall.
Fall to your wod-songs therefore yeomen bold,
And deck his herse with flowers, that lou'd you deare,
Dispose his goods, as hee hath them disposd.
Fitzwater and Matilda, bide you here,
See you the bodie vnto Wakefield borne,
A little wee will beare yee company,
But all of vs at London point to meete:
Thither Fitzwater, bring earle Robins men:
And Frier, see you come along with them.
Fri. Ah my liege Lord, the Frier faints,
And hath no words to make complaints:
But since he must forsake this place,
He will awaite, and thanks your Grace.

Song. Weepe, weepe, ye wod-men waile,
Your hands with sorrow wring:
Your maister Robin Hood lies deade,
Therefore sigh as you sing.
Here lies his Primer and his beades,
His bent bowe and his arrowes keene,
His good sworde and his holy crosse,
Now cast on flowers fresh and greene:
And as they fall, shed teares and say,

Wella, wella day, wella, wella day:
Thus cast yee flowers and sing,
And on to Wakefield take your way. Exeunt.

Fri. Here dothe the Frier leaue with grieuance:
Robin is deade, that grac't his entrance:
And being dead he craues his audience,
With this short play, they would haue patience.

¶ Enter Chester.

Chest, May Fryer, at request of thy kinde friend,
Let not thy Play so soone be at an end.
Though Robin Hoode be deade, his yeomen gone,
And that thou thinkst there now remaines not one,
To act an other Scеane or two for thee:
Yet know full well, to please this company,
We meane to end Matildaes Tragedie.

Fri. Off then, I wish you, with your Kendall greene:
Let not sad griefe, in fresh arap be seene.
Matildaes story is repleat with teares,
Wtrongs, desolations, ruine, deadly feares.
In, and attire yee: though I tired be,
Yet will I tell my mistresse Tragedie.
Apolloes master doone I inuocate:
To whome henceforth my deedes I dedicate:
That of his Godhead, 'boue all Gods diuine,
With his rich spirit he would lighten mine:
That I may sing true layes of trothlesse deedes,
Which to conceiue, my heart through sorrow bleeds.
Cheere thee, sad soule, and in a lothie line,
Thunder out wrong, compast in cloudy teares.

Enter in blacke.

Shewe to the eyes, till the beholders eares,
With all the lively acts of lustfull rage,
Restraind by modest teares, and chastities intreats,
And let king Iohn that ill part personage,
By lutes, deuices, practices and threats:

And

And when he ſees all ſcrueth to no end,
Of ſhalle Matilda let him make an end.
Cho. We are all fitted, Frier, ſhall we beginne?
Fri. Well art thou ſuted: would my order would Permit me habit equall to my heart.
Cho. If you remember, Iohn did take an oath,
Neuer againe to ſeeke Matildaes loue.
Fri. O what is he, that ſworne affections ſtaue,
That will not violate all lawes, all oathes?
And being mightie, what will he omit,
To compaſſe his intents, though nere ſo ill:
You muſt ſuppoſe king Richard now is deade,
And Iohn (reſtleſſe) is faire Englands Lord:
Who ſtriuing to forget Matildaes loue,
Takes to his wife the beautious Iſabell,
Betroth'd to Hugh de Briu, Earle of North March:
And picking quarrels vnder ſhewe of kinne,
Wholly diuorces his firſt Queene away:
But yet Matilda, ſtill, ſtill troubles him,
And being in the Court, ſo oft he courts her,
That by her noble father, old Fitzwater,
She is remoou'd from his luſt-tempting eye.
But tides reſtraind, ouerſwell their bounds with rage:
Her abſence addes more fuell to his fire.
In ſleepe he ſees her, and his waking thoughts,
Studie by day to compaſſe his deſire.
Cho. Frier, ſince now you ſpeake of viſions,
It was receiued by tradition,
From thoſe that were right neere vnto king Iohn,
Of three ſtrange viſions, that to him appeard:
And as I gueſſe, I could you what they were.
Fri. With them I will begin: draw but that vaile,
And there king Iohn ſits ſleeping in his chaire.

¶ Drawe the curten, the king ſits ſleeping, his ſworde by his side. Enter Austria, before whome commeth Ambition: and bringing him before the chaire, king Iohn, in sleepe, maketh signes to auoid, and holdeth his owne crowne fast with both his hands.

Fr. Ambition, that had euer waited on king Iohn,
Now brings him Austria, calde to be tane,
Being wholly tam'd by Richards warlike hand,
And bids him adde that Dukedome to his crowne:
But he puts by Ambition, and contemnes
All other kingdomes, but the English crowne,
Which he holds fast, as if hee would not loose.

¶ Enter Constance, leading young Arthur: both offer to take the crowne; but with his foote he ouerturneth them: to them commeth Insurrection, ledde by the F. K. and L. menacing him, and lead the childe againe to the chaire: but he only layeth hand on his sworde, and with his foote ouerthroweth the childe, whome they take vp as deade: and Insurrection flying, they mournefully beare in the bodie.

Fr. The Ladie and the childe that did ascend,
Striuing in vaine to take the crowne from Iohn,
Were Constance, and her sonne the Duke of Britaine,
Heire to the elder brother of the king.
Yet hee creepes on, and with a little spurne,
The mother and the Prince doth ouerturne.
Againe when Insurrection them assists,
Seru'd by the French king, and the wronged Earle,
Whose troth-plight wife, king Iohn had tane to wife,
He only claps his hand vpon his sword,
Watcheth their threatnings, and in their attempts,
The harmelesse Prince receiues vnreuelde death,

Who

Whome they too late with bootelesse teares lament.

¶ Enter Queene, with two children borne after her: ſhe aſcends, and ſeeing no motion, ſhe feteheth her children one by one; but ſeeing yet no motion, ſhe deſcēdeth wringing her hands, and departeth. Enter Matilda, in mourning vaile, reading on a booke, at whoſe comming he ſtarteth, and ſitteth vpright: as ſhee paſſeth by, hee ſmiles, and foldes his armes, as if hee did embrace her; being gone, he ſtarts ſodainly, and ſpeakes.

King. Matilda, ſtay Matilda, doe but ſpeake:
Whoes there? Intreate Matilda to come backe.
Bon. Who would you haue, my Lord?
Kin. Why, my Lord Bonuill: I would haue Matilda:
That but euen now, paſt by toward the dooze.
Bon. I ſawe her not my Lord.
King. Hadſt thou a louers eye,
A gnat, a moate, a ſhadowe thou wouldſt ſpy:
Come followe me, ſhe cannot be ſo farre,
But I ſhall ouertake her: come away. Exeunt.
Fri. The laſt appearance ſhadowed the faire Queene,
And her two children, at whoſe ſight king Iohn
Shewd neither ſigne nor ſhewe of paſſion:
But when the ſunne came maſked in a cloude,
And vailed beautie, ioynde with chaſtitie,
Appeared in Matildaes louely ſhape,
He ſtarts, he claſpes, he wakes, he cals, he ſeekes
The ſhadowe of that ſubſtance he affects:
To her he ſewes, but ſhe his ſute reiects:
To him he ſewes, but he her ſute neglectes:
He ſues to be her loue, ſhe doth deſpiſe:
She ſues to liue a maid, which he denies,

What followes of this wilfull will, and shall,
This no and nay, this quenchlesse, bootlesse fire,
This cold affection, and this hot desire,
The act itselfe shall tell, and the poore Frier,
Your partiall fauours humbly doth require. Exit.

Sound trumpets. Enter king, Bomuile, Salsbury, Lords.

King. Now I perceiue, this only was a dreame:
Diuine Matildaes Angell did appeare,
Deckt like a Vestall, readie for heauens quire,
And to this earthly truncke will not come neare.
Well, let her goe: I must faith, I must,
And so I will: kings thoughts should be diuine:
So are Matildaes, so henceforth shall mine.
Old Anb. So doing, peace shall wait vpon your crowne,
And blessing vpon blessing shall befall.
Kin. Its true my Lord, I know full well there shall.
Sals. Your people will war vpond of such a king,
That of himselfe is king, Lord of his thoughts:
Which by assertion of Philosophers,
Is held to be the greatest Empery.
Kin. And they said wisely, noble Anbery.
Sals. Then will Fitzwater with his gallant troopes,
Againe keepe triumphes in the English Court.
Then will Matilda
King. Matilda, what of her?
Sals. Like a bright starre, aboue the lowly traine
Of beautious Ladies, which attend the Queene,
Whose only beauty equalleth them all.
Ki. Like an old foole, whose dim eyes wanting sight,
Compar'st the sunne, to common candle light.
Sals. Pardon my liege: I doe confesse, her faire
Exceedes all these, as farre as day doth night.
King. Grossely alluded: night by moone, by starres.

By

By wandring fires, exhaled meteors,
By artificiall lightes, by eyes of beastes,
And little glow-wormes, glimpsing in the darke,
Hath somewhere brightnesse, lightnesse, and sometime
Under each Horizon in all parts cleare:
But they at no time, no where can be said
To be lesse darke, then dungeon darkenesse is.
Pitch coloured Eban fact, blacker than blacke,
While her faire eyes giues beauty to bright day.
Sal. To heare the Queene thus praisd workes my content.
Kin. The Queene? O, had I such a thought I would repent, To himselfe.
Sal. Further my Lord.
King. What shall we further wade?
I feare I shall be tyred with this rode.
Sal. The common-wealth will florish & encreasle.
K. Good Oxford of those things now hold your peace:
And take the paines to fetch in Isabell.
I haue strange tydings sent me out of France,
Which she will take, I know, in as good part,
As I accept her praise: fetch her I say.
Exit Salisbury.
What is the old foole gone? now goe thy way.
What thinkst thou o. him Hubert? tell me man.
Hub. As of a good old gentleman my Lord,
That speakes but what he thinks, & thinks you thinke
As he doth: and I warrant you
Will not conceale those praises from the Queene,
Which as hee deemes you vttred in her praise.
Kin. I would haue them beleeue it so indeede:
But I protest, is no part of my Creede.
Hu. I faith your Grace did Oxfords yeares great wrong,
To curtall his good worke, that seem'd so long:
He peraduenture would haue brought in more,
After his Preface, to rich plenties store,

Perchaunce he would haue shew'd dame vanitie,
That in your Court is suffered howerly:
And bad you punish rufflans with long haire,
Newe fashions, and such toyes: a special care
Has that good man: ye turnes the statute booke:
About his hall and chambers if you looke,
The morall vertues in faire effigis,
Are liuely painted: morall Philosophie
Has not a sentence, be it great or small,
But it is painted on his Honours wall.

Enter Queene, Oxford.

Kin. Peace, peace, he comes, now lets be silent all.
Salis. I tell you I was proud of his good words.
Qu. God hold them Oxford: for its often seene,
A reconciled foe small good affords. (hold you deare.
Salis. O for beare: trust me, I gage my Honour he doth
King. How cheere you Isabell: The earle, your spouse
Hath sent defiance to the king your husband,
And like a tried tall souldier, fled his holds
In Marchland: Where he knowes, despight of him,
And all the men that he therein can raise,
King Iohn could haue sent dogs enowe to teare
Their ill arm'd bodies peece-meale, ere his hands
Should with base blood haue staind their noble hads.
And whether is this worshipfull good Earle
(This first loue, old loue, newe loue if you will)
Gone thinks your Ladiship? Forsooth, good man,
To Normandy; and there he stirs vp coales,
And vrgeth strong aid for confederates,
Who, as he saies, are treacherously dispos'd.
Qu. If he doe so, the greater is his sinne:
Peace man, I haue no interest in him.
King. But he hath had in you, as it should seeme,
Els would he not make sonnets of your browe,
Your eye, your lip, your hand, your thigh.

A plague vpon him: how came he so nigh?
Nay, now you haue the curst queanes counterfet:
Through rage you shake, because you cannot raue,
But answere me; Why should the Bedlam slaue
Entitle a whole Poem to your kisse,
Calling it chery, ruby, this and this?
I tell you, I am iealous of your loue,
Which makes me breake into this passion.
Here's the kinde noble Aubery de Vere,
Knowes what I speake is true:
My Lord, my Lord, I doe appeale to you:
Are these things to be borne?
Sal. No by the Roode,
These loue-rimes are the tokens of small good.
Hu. Why my good Lord, was neuer Poetry,
Offred vnto a Ladies patronage?
Sals. Yes, but not taken.
Hu. Yes, and taken too.
Though muddy slaues, whose ballatizing rimes,
With words vnpolisht, shewe their brutish thoughts,
Naming their Maukins in each lustfull line:
Let no celestiall beautie looke awry,
When well writ poemes, couching her rich praise,
Are offerd to her vnstain'd vertues eye.
For Poetries high sprighted sonnes will raise,
True beautie to all wisht eternitie:
Therefore my Lord, your age is much to blame,
To thinke a taken Poeme Ladies shame.
Sa. You see the King, thats better read than you,
And far more wrongd than I, takes it not wel.
Ki. Yes but I doe: I thinke not Isabell, Lord,
The worse for any writing of Brunes.
Sa. Will you ha the troth my Lord? I thinke so too:
And though I be an old man, by my sword,
My arme shall iustifie my constant word.

Qu. After a long storme in a troublous sea,
The Pilot is no gladder of a calme,
Than Isabell to see the vexed lookes
Of her lou'd Lord, chang'd into sweete aspects.
Kin, I will not tell thee what a world of foes,
For thy loue, deare loue, rise against my life.

To himselfe.

(Matildaes loue: fewe words will fight for thee)
I will not number vp the many woes
That shall be multiplied, strife vpon strife
Will follow: But to shunne insuing ils,
Ile take such pledges as shall please me aske.
Of each proud Baron, dwelling in the Realme.
Bruse kinsman, and the deputie to March,
Hath a high minded Lady to his wife,
An able sonne for armes, and a lesse boy,
That is the comfort of his fathers life:
Madame, I know you loue the Lady well,
And of her wealth you may be bold to build,
By sending you foure hundred white milch kine,
And ten like coloured bulles, to serue that heard:
So faire, that euery cow did seeme,
And euery bull Europaes rauisher.
To friend my selfe with such a subiects truth,
Thus I commaund: You, and Earle Salsbury
Shall, with what speede conueniently ye may,
Hye ye to Gilford, there the Ladie lies,
And her sonnes too, as I am told by spies:
All that she hath, I knowe she calleth yours,
All that she hath, I gladly would call mine,
If she abuse yee: if she vse yee well,
For euer be, what she retaines, her owne:
Only goe by as Queenes in progresse doe,
And send me word how she receiueth you.

Qu. Well, I auouch she will, before I goe,

Farre

Farre be it, Iohn should proone Lord Brusses foe,
Come noble Oxford, I long to be at Gilford.
Sals. In such a businesse, Madam, so doe I. Exeunt.
King. Goe on, good Sales, now Gilford is mine owne.
Hubert, I charge you take an hundred horse,
And followe vnto Gilford Castle gates,
The Queene, pretend, you come to tend vpon,
Sent carefully from vs: when you are in,
Boldly demaund the Lady for her sonnes,
For pledges of her husbands faith and hers:
Whome when yee haue, vpon the Castle seize,
And keepe it to our vse vntill we come:
Meane while let me alone with Hugh your sonne,
To worke a wonder, if no prodigie:
But, what soere, it shall attempted be.
Hub. Euen that which to your Maiestie
May seeme contentfull, thereto I agree.
King. Goe then to Gilford, and a victor be. Exit Hub.
Moubray, our maske: are you and Chester ready?
Mow. We will before your Grace, I warrant you.
King. How thinke'st of it, Mowbray?
Hu. As on a maske; but for our torch-bearers,
Hell cannot take so mad a crewe as I.
King. Faith, who is chiefe?
Hu. Will Brand, my Lord.
But then your Grace must curbe his cruelty:
The raigne once got, he's apt for villanie.
Kin. I knowe the villaine is both rough and grim:
But as a tydogge I will muzzle him.
Ile hzing him vp to fawne vpon my friends,
And worry dead my foes. But to our maske.
I meane this night to reuell at the feast,
Where faire Matilda graceth euery guest:
And if my hidden curtesie the grace,

Old Bainards Castle good Fitzwaters place,
Iohn will make rich, with royall Englands wealth:
But if he do not: not those scattered bands,
Dropping from Austria, and the Holy land,
That boast so much of glorious victories,
Shall stoppe the inundations of those woes,
That like a deluge I will bring on them:
I know the crue is there, banish all feares:
If wrongd, they shall be ours, if welcome, theirs. Exeũt

¶ Enter Fitzwater and his sonne Bruse, and call forth his daughter.

Fitz. Why how now votary? still at your booke?
Euer in mourning weedes? For shame, for shame,
With better entertainement cheere our friends.
Now by the bleſſ crosse you are much too blame,
To crosse our mirth thus; you are much too blame I say.
Good Lord, hath neuer woe inough of wella da!
Indeed, indeede,
Some sorrow fits: but this is more than neede.

Mat. Good father pardon me,
You saw I sate the supper and the banquet,
You knowe I cannot dance, discourse I shunne:
By reason that my wit, but small before,
Comes farre behinde the ripe wits of our age.

Young B. You'l be too ripe for mariage,
If you delay, by day, and day, thus long.
There is the noble Wigmore, lord of the March,
That lyes on Wye, Lug, and the Seuerne streames,
His sonne is like the sunnes syres Ganimede,
And for your loue, hath sent a Lord to plead:
His absence, I did purpose to excuse.

¶ Enter Lester, Richmond.

But Lester is the man for him that sues.

Fitz. My cousin Bruse hath bene your broker, Lester,
At least hath broke the matter to my girle.

Lest. O for a barber at the time of neede,

Or

Or one of theſe that vſelles perſwigs,
To decke my gray head with a youthfull haire:
But I muſt too't. Matilda, thus it is;
Say, can ye loue mee? I am Wigmors ſonne.
Ma. My couſin ſaid, he look't like Ganimede:
But you, but you.
Ley. But I, but I, you ſay,
Am rather like old Chremes in a play.
But thats a nice obiection: I am hee,
But by atturneyphippe made deputie.
Mat. He's neuer like to ſpeede well, all his life,
That by attourney ſues to winne a wife:
But graunt you are, whome you ſeeme nothing like,
Young Wigmore, the heire to this noble Lord:
He for his ſonne hath yet ſent vs nere a word.
Old. Br. If you grant loue, when his ſonne doth wooe,
Then in your iopnture heele ſend, ſay, and doe.
Y. Br. And for a doore, coſin take my word,
Looke for a good egge, he was a good bird:
Cocke a the game ifaith, neuer feare.
Ma: I, but I feare the match will fall out ill,
Becauſe he ſaies his ſonne is named Will.
Fi. And why good daughter? Hath ſome Palmiſter,
Soothſaugur, or ſome dreaming Calculator
(For ſuch I know you often hearken to)
Beene prating gainſt the name? Go too, go too,
Doe not beleeue them. Leſter, fall to wooe.
Ma. I muſt beleeue my father, and tis you,
That if I ought miſdoe, reproou'd me ſtill,
And chiding ſaid, you'r wedded to your will.
Fitz. God for thy mercy, haue yee catcht me there?
Wigmore is William, woman. Leſter, ſpeake,
Thou art the ſimpleſt wooer in the world.
Leſt. You haue put me out, & ſhe hath tooke me down:
You with your talke, ſhe with her ready tongue.
You told me I ſhould find her milde and ſtill,

And scarce a worde come from her in an hower,
Then did I thinke, I should haue all the talke,
Unhindred by your willingnesse to helpe,
Unanswerd till I had no more to say: And then
Y.B. What then: the with a courtly curtsie saying nay.
Ma. Your friends atturney might haue gone his way,
With as great credit, as did that Orator,
Which handling an Oration, some three howers,
Ill for the matter, worse than bad for phrase:
Hauing said Dixi; looke, and found not one,
To praise or dispraise his Oration:
For, wearied with his talke, they all were gone.
F. Now by my troth, if any troth I haue,
I am as merry at Matildaes mirth,
As I was glad to see her first daies birth.
For till this hower, so helpe me holidam,
Since the too timely death of Huntington,
Not a blithe word had passage through her lips.
Ley. See what a pleasing humour wooers bring.
Col. B. O but yee leaue too soone.
Ley. Yet the auerers
I stand too long, shall I chuse yours or hers?
Mat. Either for feare, I pray yee, for a while.
Welcome Lord Richmond.
Rich. What, doth matilda smile?
That still like sadnesse solitary sat:
Then off with widowes weedes, and teach your feete,
(That haue forgot for want of exercise,
And by the meanes your sorrowe had no meane)
To tread a measure: for a gallant crue,
Of courtly maskers landed at the staires,
Before whome vnintreated, I am come,
And haue preuented, I beleeue, their page,
Who with his torch is entred.
Fitz. Richmond, thankes:

Boy

If you haue ought to say about the maskers,
Beseech the Gentlemen to enter in:
For they are welcome guests to old Fitzwater.
Exit Messenger.
Sonne, sonne, I pray you fetch the Ladies in:
We haue beene talking here about a match,
And left our noble friends in discontent.
Rich. May by my faith, we had much merriment;
Yet thought it long, you neither came, nor sent.
Matilda faints, and sits downe.
Fitz. How now matilda? pray thee cheere thee girle.
Mat. I thought it was a lightning before death:
Too sodaine to be certaine: good pleasure stay.
Enter Ladies.
Will thou not wanton? churle then goe thy way.
After maske.
Ri. What? chang'd so soon? so soon false to your ships?
Cheerly: the maske comes in. O God, this veile & looke
Fit not this sport.
Mat. Ile leaue it. (stay.
Lest, May: for your loue, Williams sake, faire maiden

Dance: Maskers take each a Ladie, Iohn Matilda: but refusing, father;

This is no courtship daughter, be not nice,
You both abuse him and disparage vs:
His fellowes had the Ladies they did chuse,
And wel you knowe, heres no more maids than Maud:
Your selfe are all our store: I pray you rise,
Or by my faith, I say you doe vs wrong.
Mat. I will do what you will: lead, lead your daunce.
Ki. You know me by my speach.
Mat. I my Liege, I: O! that temptatious tongue
Had no where to be plac't but in your head.

Ki. Well, say I haue her tongue, had I not neede,
When you haue both her eyes: nay all her shape:
Able to tempt euen Ioue himselfe to rape.
Ma. Good my Lord leaue; or I will leaue the place.

Daunce againe: & in the first course Maitlda flings
from him: John followes,
Fitz. Daunce out your Galliard: Gods deare holidaead,
Y'are too forgetfull: daunce, or by my troth,
You'l moue my patience more than I will speake.
She vnwilling, John roughly puls her.
Nay soft vnmannerd sir, you are too rough:
Her ioynts are weake, your armes are strong & tough:
If yee come here for sport, you welcome be,
If not, better your roome than such bad company.
John threatens him by signes.
Dost thy eaten mee? then will I see thy face,
Kin. And so thou shalt, looke on me rebell Lord;
Thou that wert late a factious ring-leader,
And in the open field gau'st me fierce fight,
Art thou againe gathering another head,
That with such rudenesse thou dost entertaine
The gentle comming of thy Soueraigne?
Fitz. My dread Lord, heare me, and forgiue this fault:
What I haue earst done, long since you forgaue:
If I did lead the Barons in the field,
The Barons chose me, when they could not chuse
But make some leader, you were so milled.
When better thoughts entred your royall breast,
We then obeyd you, as our Soueraigne head.
King, You did euen what you list, and so doe still.
I am the king, but you must haue your will:
The plaine troth is, we are not come in sport,
Though for our comming, this way our best cloake:

For

For if we neuer come, till you doe send,
We muſt not be your gueſts while bankets laſt,
Contentious brauls you howerly send to vs:
But we may send and send, and you returne,
This Lord is ſicke, that pained with the gout,
He rid from home. You thinke I finde not out
Your cloſe confederacies: yes I doe, no doubt.
Leſt. If there be here a cloſe confederate,
Gods vengeance light vpon him with my hate.
K. No, you are open Leſter, that I knowe.
Ch. I by the Lord, my Lord, your open foe. (Cheſter, Leſt. By thy Lords Lord, and mine, proud Raſe of Thou dar'ſt not ſay ſo, wert thou from the king.
Mow. Yes, but he dares and ſhall.
Rich. Mowbray, if you ſtand by,
He dares perchance, els will the daſtard fly. (ſpeach:
Ch. My owne ſword ſhall maintaine my tongues true
For it is not frequented to ſuch lies,
As wrangling Leſter, and proud Richmond vſe:
It cannot ſet out like a thundring drumme,
Or roaring Canon, ſtuft with naught but hragg,
The multitudes of ſeas died red with blood,
And famous cities into cinders turn'd,
By their two armed armes.
King. I Cheſter.
And then they ſhewe vs rags, torne off belike,
From poore decayed Ladies petticotes:
For neither bill, nor feathered ſhot, nor pike
Dare halfe or any of thoſe rents they haue:
Theſe patcht together, faſtned vnto ſtaues,
They will not ſticke to ſweare, haue beene aduanc't
Againſt the Sophie Souldan, and the Turke.
Le. Do not maintaine proud Cheſter, my liues Liege.
Your words I muſt put vp: his if I beare
Yes you ſhall beare them, beare, and yet not bite:

We haue you muzzeld now: remember once
You brau'd vs with your Bombard boasting wordes:
Come briefely, Lester, Richmõd, both Fitzwaters, Bruse,
Deliuer vp your swords immediatly:
And either yield your bodies to our hands,
Or giue such pledges as we shall accept,
Vnto our Steward Winchester, with speede.
Lest. I will not leaue my armes, nor breake my word
Except I be prouok't: your liege-man I am sworne:
That oath is pledge enough. If you mislike
Kin. Thou heerest me say, I doe.
Lest. And I reply, that pledge refus'd, I haue no more for you.
Rich. And Richmond saies as noble Lester saith;
Already haue we plighted fame and faith:
Which being scorne, returns to vs againe,
And by the kings owne mouth, we are discharg'd.
Kin. Fitzwater, what say you?
Fitz. What pledge desires my Liege?
King. I alke your stubborne daughter.
Yong Br. That were a gage to be ingag'd.
Fitz. Peace thou head-strong boy,
Pardon me soueraigne: all my power is yours:
My goods you may commaund, my life you may:
My children too I know with both their liues,
Will readily aduenture deaths worst wrongs,
To doe such seruice as true subiects should:
But honorable fame, true chastitie
Kin. Make no exceptions, yield her vp to mee,
Or looke for euer for my enmitie.
Fitz. May then Fitzwater tels your Maiestie,
You doe him wrong; and well will let you wit,
He will defende his honour to the death.
King. And Bruse, you are no otherwise disposd,
You will not giue your sons to me for pledge.

Br.

Br. I haue but one, being my leſſer boy,
Who is at Gilford: for my other ſonne,
Ki. He braues me with the reſt.
Well it is night, and theres no ſunne to weare by,
But by Gods ſonne: and by him I here proteſt,
A miſerable ſtorme this night to raiſe,
That ſhall not ceaſe, while England glueth reſt,
To ſuch vile traitors: Bruſe Ile begin with you:
I will ifaith, as true as God is true.
Exeunt king, cum ſuis.
Leſt. Then ſhal a ſtorme be rais'd againſt a ſtorme,
And tempeſt be with tempeſt beaten backe.
Fitz. But this firme Iland like the ſea will toſſe,
And many goodly buildings goe to wracke,
Many a widowe weepe her dying ſonne,
And many a mother to her helpleſſe babes
Cry out vncomfortably: children peace,
Your crying vnto me is all in vaine,
Dead is my husband, your poore father ſlaine.
Yong Br. We can not helpe it vnkle. (power:
Ri. No, you ſee intreats & humble ſutes haue now no
But yrſt and wrath the kingdome doth deuour.
Br. & he did menace firſt, and much I feare
He will to Gilford, and beſiege my wife.
Fitz. Dhye to ſaue her, Richmond ride with him,
Rich. Let vs away Bruſe, leaſt we come to late,
And with vs take ſome ſcore of men well armde.
Exeunt Richmond,
Fitz. Doe: Leſter, and my ſelfe will keepe the citie,
Til we are furniſht with an able armie.
Your Nephew Bruſe, ſhal take an hundred armed men,
And poaſt to Hartford Caſtle with your ſiſter:
Sith wrong will wake vs, we will keepe ſuch watch,
As for his life, he ſhall not hurt vs hying.
Exeunt ombes.

¶Enter Queene, Bruses Ladie, Hubert, Salsbury.

Qu. Be comforted good Madame, doe not feare,
But giue your sonne as pledge vnto the king:
Your selfe at Court may keepe him company.
Wif. I am betraid, alas I am betraid,
And little thought your Highnesse had bene bent,
So much against me, for my many loues,
As to prepare an entrance for my foe.
Qu. As I shall liue in heauen, I did not knowe
Of Huberts comming: but lament not this:
Your sonne you say is gone; what feare you then?
Wi. O madame, murder, mischiefe, wrongs of men
I feare, I feare: what if I doe not feare?
Such hope is so farre of, despaire so neare.
Ox. Answere mee good Hubert. I pray the Hubert doe.
What thinke you of this matter, may I on your word
Perswade the woman that all things are well?
Hu. You may perswade her, if you can my Lord:
For I protest I knowe no other thing,
But that the king would haue him for a pledge of the Lord Bruses faith.
Salf. And reason too. Now by my Honour, Hubert, I protest it is good reason.
Bruse, I tell you plaine,
Is no sound cloake, to keepe Iohn from the raine.
I will goe to her. Hu. Doe good simple Earle.
If not by threats, nor my intreats she yield,
Thy braine is barren of inuention,
Dried vp with care: I neuer will thee yield her sonne to thee, that hauing power, wantst wit.
Br. Wife, I ouerheare thee Hubert.
Ox. So do I dame Bruse:
But stir no coles: the man is well belou'd,
And merits more than so.
Bru. W. But I will answere.

Hubert

Hubert, thou fatall keeper of poore babes,
That are appointed hoſtages for Iohn,
Had I a ſonne here, as I haue not one
(For yeſterday I ſent him into Wales)
Thinkſt thou I would be ſo degenerate,
So farre from kinde, to giue him vnto thee?
I would not I proteſt: thou knoweſt my minde.
Ox. Ladie, you feare more than you needed doe,
Indeede you doe, in very deede you doe:
Hubert is wrongd about the thing you meane,
About young Arthur: Q. I thought twas ſo:
Indeede the honeſt, good, kinde gentleman
Did all he might for ſafegard of the childe.
Qu. Beleeue me Madame Bruſe, the man is wrongd.
B.w. But he wrongs me, to keepe my Caſtle thus,
Diſarming my true ſeruants, arming his.
Now more of outrage comes, what ſhall I doe?

¶ Enter the king, Mowbray, Winchester, Cheſter.

King. O this is well. Hubert, wheres Bruſes ſonne?
Wi. Where thou ſhalt neuer ſee him, Iohn.
K. Ladie, we ſhall haue talke with you anone.
Where is he Hubert? (to conſeſſe.
Hu. Hid, or fled my Lord: we can by no means get her
Sa. Welcome to Gilford, Oxfords liefeſt Lord.
K. You ſcarce giue welcome, ere I bid you goe:
For you my Lord, the Queene and Winchester,
Shall march to Harford. Sweete Iſabell,
And if thou loue me, play the Amazon.
Matilda that hath long bewitche mine eye,
Is as I heare by ſpials, now in Harford Caſtle;
Beſiege her there: for now her hauty father
Ruffians it vp and downe, and all the brood
Of viperous traitors whet their poyſoned teeth,
That they may feed on vs that follow them.
One forward, and goe with you victorie:

Which to assure, my powers shall followe you.
Salf. Did I not tell you this: then trust me next:
Nay he is chang'd, and cares no more for her,
Than I doe Madame.
King. Be gone I say, be gone:
Your speede, rich victory attendeth on:
But your delay
May giue your foes the happie glorious day.
Qu. One boone my Liege, and part.
Kin. Be briefe.
Qu. Shew that poore Ladie pittie, I beseech. Exeunt.
Kin. I will indeede. Come Ladie, let vs in.
You haue a sonne, goe in and bring him mee,
And for the Queenes sake I will fauour yee.
B.W. I haue no son: come, come: come in and search,
And if you finde him, wretched may I bee. Exit.
Ki. Chester and Hubert, see you keepe good watch.
Not farre of doe I heare a warlike sound:
Bruse on my life: looke too't while I goe in
To seeke this boy; for needs we must haue him.
Come with vs Mowbray. Exeunt.

¶ Enter Bruse, Richmond, Souldiers.

Rich. The Castle gates are shut. what ho: what ho?
You that are seruants to the Lady Bruse,
Arise, make entrance for your Lord and friends.

Enter, or aboue, Hugh, Winchester.

Hu. We will make issue ere yee enter here.
Who haue we there, Richmond and Bruse? Ist you?
What, vp so soone, are yee so earely here?
In you yfaith the Prouerb's verified:
Y'are earely vp, and yet are nere the neare.
Rich. The worse our fortune, Bruse let vs goe hence,
We haue no power to fight, nor make defence.
Ch. What Richmond, will you proue a Runaway?
Rich. From thee good Winchester: Now ẏ Lord defend.

Bruse

Bruſe, we will ſtay and fight.

Br. Tis to no end: we haue but twentie men, & they be tyr'd.

But ere we doe retire, tell me Lord Hubert,

Where are my wife and ſonne?

Hu. Your wife is here, your ſonne we cannot finde.

Br. Let ſon & wife, high heauens, your comfort finde.

Exeunt.

¶ Enter King, Mowbray, Ladie Bruſe, Cheſt. Bruſe hath beene here, my Lord.

Ki. I, let him goe: we haue good pledges: though wee ſee but one,

The other we are ſure will come anone.

Mow. I doe aduiſe you, for your owne diſcharge,

Deliuer vp your ſonne vnto the king.

King. Nay let her chuſe. Come hither Mowbray.

The king and Mowbray whiſper.

Hu. The king is angry: Ladie Bruſe aduiſe you.

L. Br. What he aduiſ'd by thee, to haue my louing, kinde and prettie boy, giuen to an vnkinde killer of ſweete boyes?

Ch. Madame go too, take counſell of your friends, I warrant you the king will vſe him well.

L. B. I, as he vſ'd his Nephewe, Arthur Cheſter: God bleſſe my childe from being vſed ſo.

Mow. Sir Hubert, what are all the people voided, The horſes and the cattle turned forth?

Hu. Mowbray, they be.

Mow. Then will I doe the kings commaundement.

L. B. What will he doe! good lord, what will he doe! Mowbray, I pray you what iſt you will doe.

Mo. Why? fire the Caſtle.

L. B. The Caſtle Mowbray? tarry, tarry man, Hold me not Cheſter, gentle Mowbray ſtay: Good Hubert let me goe.

Mow. You muſt not goe: the king is moou'd and will not heare you ſpeake.

L.Br. But he ſhall heare mee, Pittie mee king Iohn, call Mowbray backe: heare mee for pities ſake, regard the Ladie Bruſes wofull cry.

K. What doſt thou alke?

La. Firſt call backe Mowbray.

K. Stay Mowbray: now be briefe.

L. I haue ſome linnen garments, iewels, tyres, Packt in a hamper here within the lodge: O let me ſaue it from conſuming fire.

K. And is this all?

La. Its all the little all, I here haue left.

King. Away, ſet fire; linnen and trash.

L. Once moze heare mee, theres a pretious Iem, You haue not any richer in all the Realme: If fire doe blemiſh it, Arte neuer moze, To his true colour, can the ſame reſtoze.

Ki. Fetch it: two of yee helpe her wt her hamper hither.

La. Nay, nay: one will ſuffice: the Iewell if I ſaue, is all I alke. Exit with Cheſter.

Kin. We ſhall her Iewell haue.

Hu. She is very fearefull I ſhould keepe her ſonne.

Within, La. Ye doe, yee doe.

Ki. Alas good Ladie: harke, Cheſter & ſhe are chiding.

Enter Cheſter and ſhe, leading the boy.

La. Let goe his hand. Is this a pawe, thinke you, To holde a tender hand in? fie for ſhame: A noble man ſo churliſh? Looke I pray, His armes are grittles.

King. How now Lady Bruſe, Doth Cheſter hurt the Iewell of your ioy?

Now by my troth it is a prettie boy.

La. I: knowe your Maieſtie as much as I, you would ſay moze.

King.

K. Well, he and you of vs no wrong shall haue:
But stay in Windsor Castle with sir Walter Blunt,
And honourably be vsed: prouided still,
Your husband and your sonne obey our will.
L. For this great mercie, if they disobey,
My selfe will chide them: Fortune follows Iohn,
And on his foes fall swift destruction. Exeunt.
K. Come let vs now after the Queene & Oxford.
Exeunt omnes.

Enter the Queene, Oxford, Souldiers.

Qu. Now are yee, worthy and resolued men,
Come to the cage where the vncleane birds bide,
That tyre on all the faire flight in the Realme.
Summon this Castle, or (to keepe my words)
This cage of night-hid owles, light-flying birds.
Offer to summon. Enter yong Bruse, Matilda, Souldiers.
Ox. Stay drum: thou need'st not summon willing men:
Or rather wilfull: for such me thinke they be.
Qu. See yee yon baggage, muffled in black weeds?
Those clouds folde in the Comet, that portends
Sad desolation to this royall Realme:
For euer seeke to make her light, good friends.
Let vs disrobe her of each little beame,
And then your Phœbus will one Phœbe haue,
That while they glue their faire and your true light,
Giue ioy vnto your day, rest to your night.
Assaile them: stay not.
Ox. Stay, and assaile them first.
I say to you, faire Queene, this fact is foule.
Let not prouoking words whet dull edg'd swords:
But try if we can blunt sharpe blades with words.
Fitzwaters Nephew, Bruse, I see thee there,
And tell thee, it is shame for such a boy,

To lead a many able men to fight.
And modeſt looking maid, I ſee you too:
And vnlike fight, to viewe virginitie
Guarded with other ſouldiers, than good prayers:
But you will ſay the king occaſions it.
Say what you will, no king but would take cauſe
Of iuſt offence: yield you young Bruſe: your mother is in holde.
Yield you young maid: your father is in holde.
Ma. Will the Queene keepe me from the luſtfull king?
Then will I yield.
Qu. A plague vpon this counterfaiting queane.
Mar. Gods bleſſed mercy, will you ſtill be mad,
And wrong a noble virgine with vile ſpeach?
Ox. Let me alone Matilda, maiden faire,
Thou virgine ſpouſe, true Huntingtons iuſt heire,
Wilt thou come hither? and I doe protеſt,
The Queene and I, to mitigate this warre,
Will doe what thou wouldeſt haue.
Ma. I come.
Br. You ſhall not goe: ſound drums to warre.
Ox. Alack, alack for woe: well God for vs, ſith it will needes be ſo.

Alarum, fight, ſtay.

Ox. What ſtay you for?
Br. Matildaes cryes doe ſtay vs.
Mar. Oxford, I come in hope of thy defence.
Br. I will [illegible] you ſhall yield your ſelfe;
To any coward Lord that ſerues the King.
Ox. To ward proud boy? thou findeſt me no ſuch beaſt,
And thou ſhalt rue in earneſt this rude teſt.

Fight againe, Matilda taken, led by the haire by two Souldiers.

Ox. Rude hands how hale you vertuous honour forth?
You doe not well: away: now by my faith,

You

Yee doe not well I say.
Take her, faire Queene, vse her as she deserues:
Shees faire, shees noble, chast, and debonaire.
I must, according to due course of warre,
See that our souldiers scatter not too fare,
Least what care wonne, our negligence may loose. Exit.

Qu. Is this the Helen, this the Paragon,
That makes the English Ilinnus flame so fast?

Mat. I am not he, you see I am not shee:
I am not rauisht yet, as Helen was,
I know not what will come of Iohns desire,
That rages like the sea, that burnes like fire.

Qu. Plaine Iohn, proud Ione? Ile teare your painted face: thus, thus Ile vse you.

Enter Oxford.

Ma. Doe, doe, what you will.

Ox. How goes this geere? hath foule fall so foule a deed,
Poore chast childe of Fitzwater dost thou bleede.
By Gods bleſt mother this is more than neede:
And more I tell you true than I would beare,
Were not the danger of the campe so neere.

Enter a messenger.

Mess. My Lord, the foes haue gathered head:
Lord Bruse the father, ioyneth with the sonne.

Ox. Why heres the matter, we must spend our time,
To keepe your nailes from scratching innocence,
Which should haue beene bestowed for our defence.
What shall we now doe? helpe me holy God,
The foe is come, and we are out of ranke.

Skirmish: Queene taken, Matilda reseued.

Enter olde Bruse wounded, led by his sonne and Lester.

Br. Is the field ours?

Young Br. I, thanks to noble Lester.

Br. Giue God thanks, sonne, be carefull to thy mother:

Commend me to Fitzwater, loue thy brother,
If either armes, or prayers may him recouer, Fals down.
Lest. How cheeres old Bruse?
Br. His soule to ioy is fled:
His griefe is in my bosome buried.
Lest. His life was dearely bought. For my eyes sawe
A chambles of dead men about his feete,
Sent by his sword vnto eternall shade:
With honour burie him: cease teares good Bruse.
Br. Teares helpe not I confesse: yet must I weepe.
Souldiers, your helpe to beare him to my tent.
Exeunt, cum Bruse.
Ma. Be comforted great Queene: forget my wrongs.
It was my fortune, and no fault of yours.
Qu. Is she thus milde? or doth she mock my chance?
Lest. Queene Elianor, are you a prisoner?
See what it is to be a souldier.
But what foule hand hath harm'd Matildaes faire?
Speake honourable maid: who tore thy haire?
Did Oxford or the Queene this violence?
Ma. Vngentle groomes first tooke and tore me thus:
From whom old Oxford, chastising their wrong,
Most kindly brought mee to this gentle Queene:
Who laid her soft hand on my bleeding cheekes,
Gaue kisses to my lips, wept for my woe:
And was deuising how to send me backe,
Euen when your last alarum frighted vs:
And by her kindnesse, fell into your hands.
Lest. Which kindnesse we returne. Madame, be free.
Souldiers, conduct the Queene whether she please.
Qu. Farewell Matilda: if I liue, beleeue,
I will remember this. O how I grieue,
That I should wrong so innocent a maid.
Come Ladie, old Fitzwater is not farre:
Hele weepe to see these scarres, full well I knowe.

Ma Would I were from this wofull world of warre:
Sure I will scape, and to some Nunry goe. Exeunt,
Enter king, Oxford, Hubert.
K. Had you her then: had you her in your power?
Ox. I marry had we; we had taken her.
K. O had the beene in mine, (her.
Not all earths power, from my power, should haue freed
Ox. You are a king: and high are Princes thoughts:
It may be with your light you could haue chact
An host of armed men: it may be so:
But we your subiects did the best we could:
Yet Bruse the father, backing Bruse the sonne,
Scattred our troopes: brought rescue to Matilda,
And tooke your peerlesse Queene, their prisoner.
K. On all the race of Bruses, for this wrong,
I will haue vengeance. Hubert, call in Brand. Exit Hu.
My Lord of Oxford, giue vs leaue a while to be alone.
Ox. I will my liege: but be you comforted,
The Queene will be recouer'd, doe not feare,
As well as ere she was:
K. Oxford, for beare I pray. (I feare. Exit.
Ox. Yet for the wrong she did vnto Matilda, I feare,
K. The father and the sonne did rescue her:
The mother and the sonne shall rue the deede:
So it shall be: I am resolu'd thereon.
Matilda, my soules foode, those haue bereft:
And these of bodies foode I will bereaue.
Enter Hubert, Brand.
K. Will Brand?
Brand. Your Maiestie. Make legs.
K. Lesse of your curtlie. Hubert, stand aside.
Poast speedily to Windsor: take this ring:
Bid Blunt deliuer Bruses wife and childe,
Into your hands: and aske him for the key
Of the darke tower, or the dungeon vault:

In that, see you shut vp the dam and brat.
Pretend to Blunt that you haue left them meat,
Will serue some fennight: and vnto him say,
It is my will you bring the key away.
And here you sir, I charge you on your life,
You doe not leaue a bit of bread with them.
Brand. I warrant you, let me alone.
Ki. Come backe againe with all the speede you may.
Hugh. Some cruell taske is pointed for that slaue,
Which he will execute as cruelly.
Kin. Ruth, no pittie shall haue harbour here,
Till faire Matilda be within these armes.

Enter Oxford with the Queene.

Oxf. Comfort my Lord, comfort my gratious Lord.
Your loue is come againe.
Ki. Ah Oxford, where?
Ox. Here my dread Soueraigne.
Kin. Thou lyest, she is not there.
Ox. Vnder correction you wrong my age.
Say I beseech you, is not this the Queene?
Kin. I cry you mercie Oxford, tis indeede.
Where is Matilda?
Qu. Where vertue, chastitie, and innocence remain, there is Matilda.
King How comes she, pray, to be so chaste, so faire, so vertuous in your eye?
Qu. She freed me from my foes, and neuer beg'd
My great abuse, when she was prisoner.
Kin. What did you to her?
Qu. Raild vpon her first,
Then tare her haire, and rent her tender cheekes.
K. O heauen! was not the day darke at that foule deed?
Could the sunne see, without a red eclipse,
The purple teares fall from those tyrant wounds!

Out

Out Archiope, Gypſie, thick lipt Blackamooze:
Wolfe, Tygreſſe, worſe than either of them both.
Ox. Are you aduiſd my Lord?
K. Out doting Earle.
Couldſt thou endure to ſee ſuch violence?
Ox. I tell you plaine my Lord, I brookt it not,
But ſtaid the tempeſt.
K. Rend my lones cheekes? that matchleſſe Effigie,
Of wonder-working, natures chiefeſt worke.
Teare her rich haire? to which, gold wyres,
Sunnes rayes, and beſt of beſt compares
(In their moſt pride) haue no compariſon.
Abuſe her name? Matildaes ſacred name?
O barbarous outrage, rude. . . le mercileſſe-
Qu. I told you Oxford, you miſtooke the king.
Ox. I did indeede: my liege Lord giue me leaue,
To leaue the Campe.
K. Away old foole: and take with thee that trull:
For if ſhe ſtay,
Ox. Come Ladie, come away.
Tempt not his rage: ruine wrath alwaies brings:
Luſt being lord, there is no truſt in kings. Exit.

¶ Enter Mowbray.

Mou. To armes king Iohn: Fitzwaters field is pitcht,
About ſome mile hence, on a champain plaine.
Cheſter hath drawne our ſouldiers in array:
The wings already haue begun the fight.
K. Thither we will with wings of vengeance fly,
And winne Matilda, or looſe victory. Exeunt.

Enter Ladie Bruſe, and Brand.

La. Why did my keeper put vs in thy hands?
Wherein haue we offended Blunt or thee?
Brand. You needs not make theſe words:
You muſt remoone your lodging: this is all.

Be not afeard: come come, here is the doore,
L. O God how darke it is!
Brand. Goe in goe in: its higher vp the staires.
La. My trembling heart forbids mee to goe in.
O if thou haue compassion, tell me true,
What my poore boy and I must trust vnto?
Brand. I tell thee true, compassion is my foe:
Yet haue I had of thee compassion.
Take in thy childe: as I haue faith or troth,
Thou and thy boy shall be but prisoners:
And I must daily bring you meat and drinke.
La. Well thou hast sworn and God so giue thee light,
As in this darke place thou remembrest vs.
Poore heart, thou laugh'st, and hast not wit to thinke,
Vpon the many feares that me afflict.
I will not in: helpe vs, assist vs Blunt,
We shall be murdred in a dungeon.
Brand. Cry without cause? He haue yee in, yfaith.
La. O let my boy and I but dine with Blunt,
And then I will with patience goe in.
Br. Will ye, or nill yee, zounds, ye must goe in,
And neuer dine.
La. What saiest thou? neuer dine?
Bra. No not with Blunt, I meane. Goe in I say:
Or by this hand, yee get no meat to day,
La. My childe is hungry. When shall he haue meat?
Bra. Why, and ye would goe in, immediately.
La. I will goe in: but very much I doubt,
Nor I, nor my poore boy shall ere come out. Exit
Hee seemes to locke a doore.
Br. Here while yee liue, yfaith: now are they sure.
Cry till their hearts ake, no man can them heare.
A miserable death is famishment:
But what care I? the king commaunded me.

Alarum

Alarum within: excursions. Enter Fitzwater, Bruse.

Fitz. Now doth faire fortune offer hope of speede:
But howsoere we speede: good cosin Bruse,
March with three hundred bowes & pikes to Windsor,
Spreading a rumour that the day is ours:
As ours it shall be, with the helpe of heauen.
Blunt loues our part farre better than the kings:
And will, I gage my life, vpon the newes,
Surrender vp the Castle to our vse.
By this meane shall you helpe vs to a holde,
How ere it chance, set free your Lady mother
That liues in prison there, with your young brother.

Br. Away good vnkle, to the battel goe:
But that a certaine good insues I knowe,
For all the world, I would not leaue you so.

Fitz. Away, away.
God send thee Windsor: vs this happie day.

Alarum still. Enter Heghbert.

Hu. You cannot hide your selfe Matilda: no disguise
Will serue the turne: now must you to the king:
And all these warres will with your presence cease.
Yield you to him, heele soone will yield to peace.

Ma. They say thou took'st some pittie of a childe,
The king appointing thee to fear his eyes.
Men doe report thee to be iust of word,
And a deare louer of my Lord the king.
If thou didst that if thou be one of these:
Pittie Matilda, prostrate at thy feete.

Hugh. I saw'd young Arthurs eyes, and pittie thee:
My word is iust, which I haue giuen the king.
The king I loue: and thee I knowe he loues.
Compare these: then how can I pleasure thee?

Ma. By letting me escape to Dunmow Abbey,
Where I will end my life a votary.

Hu. And the king die with doting on thy loue.
Mat. No, no: this fire of lust would be soone laide,
If once he knewe me sworne a holy maid.
Hu. Thy teares and loue of vertue haue the power
To make me, at an instant, true and false:
True to distressed beautie and rare chastitie:
False to king Iohn, that holds the light of thee
Dearer than England, or earths Emperie.
Goe happie soule, that in so ill an age,
Hast such faire beautie for thy heritage:
Yet goe not so alone. Dost heare tall Souldier?
Call a Souldier.
I know thee honest: guide this gentle maid,
To Dunmow Abbey: the is one I knowe.
I will excuse thee and content thee well.
My signet take, that yee may passe vnsearcht.
Mat. Kinde nubert, many prayers, for this good deede,
Shall on my beads be daily numbered.
¶ Enter Lester, Richmond, Fitzwater.
Lest. O trebble heat of honour, toyle and rage!
How cheeres earle Richmond?
Fitzwater, speake old man.
We are now neere together; answere mee.
Fitz. Lester, the more our woe,
The likelier to be taken by the foe.
Rich. O let not such a thought abuse thy age:
Weele neuer yield vs to the tyrants rage.
Fitz. But if my girle be yielded,
Lest. If she be.
Fitz. I, I: theres no man but shall haue his time to dy.
Lest. Now is our power which they shall dearly buy.

¶ Enter king, Hugh, Chester, Mowbray.
Rich. Lester, weele stand like three Battalions:
What saies our noble Generall thereto?

Fitz.

Fitz. Why, I say doe: while I can, Ile keepe my place with you.

King. How now my bug-beare, will ye now submit?

Lest. To death, but not to thee.

Kin. Richmond, not you?

Rich. Earle Richmond will not yield.

K. Methinkes Fitzwater, you should haue more wit.

Fitz. If it be wit to liue, I haue no will:
And so in this, my will orerules my wit.

Ki. Alarum then, with weapons will (wit.
We scourge your desperate will, and teach yee to haue

Fight: driue back the king.

Withdrawe.

K. Of high heroicke spirits be they all:
We will withdrawe a little and conferre:
For they are circled round, and cannot scape.
Rich. O that we three, who in the sunsarise,
Were like the three Triumuirates of Rome)
Guids of an hoast, able to vanquish Rome,
Are now alone, inclosd with enemies!

Fitz. The glorie of the world hath no more stay:
But as it comes, it fleetes, and fades away.

Lest. Courage, and let us die; they come againe:
Its Lord Hugh Burgh alone, Hughberr, what newes?

Hu. This dales fierce slaughter, lohn, our King, lamēts:
And to you three, great leaders of an hoast,
That now haue not a man at all to leade:
You worthie captaines without companies

Lest. Fitzwater, Richmond; by the blessed Sunne,
Lord Hubert mocks vs.

hu. By the Moone I doe not, and put the blessed too't.
It is as good an oath as you haue swoine.
My heart grieues, that so great hearts, as yours be,
Should put your fortunes on a sort of slaues,
That bring base feare within them to the field:

But to the matter. Sith your state is such,
That without mercie you are sure of death
(Which I am sure, and wel his Highnesse knowes,
You doe not feare at all) yet he giues grant,
On iust conditions you shall saue your liues.
Fitz. On no condition will I saue my life,
Except Matilda be returnd againe,
Unblemisht, unabus'd; and then I yield.
Hugh. She now is where she neuer will returne.
Fitz. Neuer? O God! is my Matilda dead?
Hugh. Deade to the world: dead to this woe she is.
She liues at Dunmow, and is vowd a Nunne.
Fitz. Doe not delude me Hubert, gentle sonne.
Hugh. By all the faith and honour of my kin:
By my vnstain'd allegiance to the king:
By my owne word, that hath reprooue lesse bin,
She is at Dunmow.
Fitz. O, how came she there?
Hu. When all these fields were walks for rage & fear
(This, howling like a heard of hungry wolues:
That, scudding as a heard of frighted deere)
When duff arising like a cole blacke fogge,
From friend diuided friend, found foe to foe:
Yet neither those, nor these could either know,
Till here and there through large wide mouthed woods
Proud life, euen in the glorie of his heat,
Losing possession, belcht forth streames of blood:
Whose spouts in falling, made ten thousand drops,
And with that purple shower the duff alaid:
At such a time met I the trembling maid,
Deeming a doue, from all her fellowes parted.
Seene, knowne, and taken: vnseene & vnknowne,
To any other that did knowe vs both,
At her entreats I sent her safely guided,
To Dunmow Abbey: and the guide returnd,

At-

Assures me she was gladfully receiu'd,
Pitied: and in his sight did take her oath.
Fitz hubert, for this thy honourable deede,
I and my house will reuerence thy name.
Hub. Yet, I beseech you, hide it from the king:
At least that I commaid her to the place.
Enter King, Mowbray, Chester,
Fitz. Hubert, I will.
Ki. What, stand they still on tearmes?
Lest. On honourable tearmes, on tearms of right.
Our liues without our libertie we scorne.
King. You shall haue life and libertie, I sweare.
Lest. Then Lester bowes his knee to his liege Lord,
And humbly begs his Highnesse to beware
Of wronging innocence, as he hath done.
Rich. The like Richmond desires; & yields his sword.
Kin. I doe imbrace ye both, and hold my selfe
Richer by a whole Realm, in hauing you.
Fitz. Much is my wrong: yet I submit with these,
Begging free-leaue, to liue a priuate life.
King. Old brands of malice in thy bosome rest.
Thou shalt haue leaue to leaue me, neuer doubt.
Fitzwater, see thou shippe thee straight for France,
And neuer set thy foote on English shore,
Till I repeale thee. Goe goe hence in peace.
Lest. Why doth your Highnesse wrong Fitzwater thus?
King. I right his wrong; he's wearie of the land.
Rich. Not of the land, but of a publike life.
Kin. Content ye Lords: in such quick times as these,
We must not keepe a drone among our bees.
Fitz. I am as glad to goe, as you to send:
Yet I beseech this fauour of your Grace,
That I may see Matilda ere I part.
K. Matilda? See Matilda, if thou canst
Before Sunne set; stay not another day.

The Abbey wals, that showd my happy child,
Appeare within her hapleſſe fathers ſight.
Farewell my Soueraigne. Leſter, Richmond, Lords:
Farewell to all: griefe giues no way to words.

King. Fitzwater ſtay: Lords, giue vs leaue a while.

Hubert, goe you before vnto the Abbeſſe,
And ſignifie our comming; let her bring (Exit Hubert.)

Matilda to her father. Come old man;
Be not too froward, and we ſhall be friends.
About this girle our moſt all iarres began:
And if thou wilt, here all our quarrell ends.

Fitz. Reſerue my honour, and my daughters fame,
And no poore ſubiect that your Grace commands,
Shall willinger ſubmit, obey, and ſerue.

K. Do then but this: Perſwade thy beautious child,
To leaue the Nunry and returne to Court:
And I proteſt from henceforth to forſweare
All ſuch conceipts of luſt as I haue borne.

Fitz. I will, my Lord, doe all that I may doe:
But giue me leaue, in this, to doubt of you.

K. This ſmall thing graunt, and aſke me any thing:
Or elſe die in exile, loath'd of the King.

Fitz. You ſhall perceiue I will doe what I may.
Enter, on the wall, Abbeſſe, Matilda.

Ha. Matilda (is afraid to leaue the houſe:
But loe, on yonder battlement ſhe ſtands:
But in no caſe will come within your hands.

K. What: will my Lady Abbeſſe warres with vs:
Speake Ladie; wherefore ſhut you vp your gates?

Ab. Haue we not reaſon, when an hoaſt of men,
Hunt and purſue religious chaſtitie?
King Iohn, bethinke thee what thou tak'ſt in hand,
On paine of interdiction of thy Land.
Murdrers and fellons may haue ſanctuary:

And

And shall not honorable maids distrest,
Religious virgins, holy Nunnes professt,
Haue that (small priuiledge: Now out vpon thee, out.
Holy Saint Catherine shield my virginitie:
I neuer stoode in such extreamitie.

Hu. My Lord, the Abbesse lyes, I warrant you:
For I haue heard, there is a Monke of Bury,
That once a weake comes thither to make merry.

Kin. Content thee Hubert, that same mouke and he,
And the worst come, my instruments shall be.
Good Ladie Abbesse, feare no violence:
There's not one here shall offer you offence. (Exit.

Fitz. Daughter, all this while teares my speach haue
My Lord the King: Lords all draw neare I pray:
And heare a poore mans parting from his childe.

Matilda. Still my vntaind honours ioy,
Faire Ornament of old Fitzwaters coat,
Borne to rich fortunes, did not this ill age
Bereaue thee of thy birth-rights heritage,
Thou lect our Soueraigne, Lord of both our liues,
A long beliegers of thy chastitie.
Hath scattred all our forces, slaine our friends,
Raced our Castles, left vs here a house
Wherein to hide vs from his wrathfull eye:
Yet God prouides; France is appointed mee:
And thou find'st house-roome in this Nunry.
Here if the king should dote, as he hath done,
Its sacriledge to tempt a holy Nunne:
But I haue hope he will not: yet my feare
So brownes my hope, as I am forst to stay,
And leaue abruptly, what I more would say.

Mat. O goe not yet, my griev'd hearts comforter,
I am as valiant to resist desire,
As euer thou wert worthie in the field.
Iohn may attempt: but if Matilda yield,

O then.

Fitz. I then Matilda, thou dost loose
The former glorie of thy chast resolues.
These seauen years hast thou bid a Martyrs pains,
Resisting in thy selfe lust-growing fier:
For being mortall, sure thou hadst desire.
And fiue sad winters haue their full course runne,
Since thou didst bury noble Huntington.
In these years, many months, and many daies,
Haue bene consum'd, thy vertues to consume:
Gifts haue bene heralds, Pandars did presume
To tempt thy chast eares, with their vnchast tongues:
All in effect, working to no effect.
For I was still the watchman of thy tower;
The keeper of fowle wormes, from my faire flower:
But now, no more, no more Fitzwater may
Defend his poore Lambe, from the Lyons prey:
Thy order and thy holy prayers may.
To helpe thee, thou hast priuiledge by lawe:
Therefore be resolute, and nobly die,
Abhorre base lust, defend thy chastitie.

K. Dispatch Fitzwater, hinder not thy childe:
Many preferments doe on her awaite.

Fitz. I girle, I know thou shalt be offerd wealth.
(Which is a shrewde inticement in sad want)
Great honours to lift vp thy lowe estate,
And glorious titles to eternize thee.
Al these doe but gild ouer vgly shame:
Such wealth, my child, forerunns releaselesse need:
Such honour euer prooues dishonourate.
For titles, none comes neare a vertuous name:
O keepe it euer, as thou hast done yet.
And though these darke times should forget thy praise,
An age will come, that shall eternize it.
Bid me farewell, and speake it in a word.

Ma. Farewell deare father.
Fitz. Oh farewell sweete childe:
My Liege farewell: Lester, Richmond, Hughbert,
Chester, and Mowbray: friends and foes farewell.
Matilda, see thou keepe thy spotlesse fame,
And liue eterniz'd; els die soone with shame. Exit.
Na. Amen, amen: father, adieu, adieu:
Griefe dwels with mee, sweete comfort follow you.
Ab. Come daughter come: this is a wofull sight,
When good endeauours are oppreſt by might.
Exeunt from aboue, Abbesse, Matilda.
K. Ah Hubert, seest thou not the sunne go downe,
Clowdy and darke? Matilda, stay one word.
She shakes her head, and scornefully saies nay.
Rich. How cheer'st thou Lester?
Lest. Mad man, at my state:
That cannot raise true honour ruinate.
Enter Messenger.
King. I will not be disdeigned: I vowe to see
Quick vengeance on this girle for scorning me.
Mess. Young Bruse, my Lord, hath gotten Windsor castle,
Slaine Blunt your Constable, and those that kept it:
And finding in a tower his mother dead,
With his young brother staru'd and famished:
That euery one may see the rufull sight,
In the thick wall he a wide windowe makes:
And as he found them, so he lets them be
A spectacle to euery commer by,
That heauen and earth, your tyrant shame may see.
All ye ople cursing, crying fie vpon
The tyrant mercilesse, inhumane Iohn.
Ki. Chester, and Mowbray, march away to Windsor:
Suppresse that traitor Bruse. What if his dam,
In wilfull fury, would receiue no meat,
Nor suffer her young childe any to eat,
Is it our fault? Haste yee with speede away,

And we will followe: goe, be gon I pray. Exit, Ch. How,
Hu, O black and woful deede! O pittious thing,
When slaues attend the fierce thoughts of a king.
Lest, My Lord, shall we goe too?
Kin. Lester and Richmond, I: I pray yee doe:
Lest, Get I my Beare & ragged staffe once more
Rail'd in the field, for these wrongs some shall roare.
Exit Richmond, Lester.
K. Fetch in the Monke of Bury, that I talkt off,
Exit Hubert, for the Monke.
And bid Will Brand, my instrument of death,
Come likewise in. Conuert, to raging hate.
Monke, Hugh, Brand, enter.
My long resisted loue. Welcome good Monke.
Mon. Thanks to my Liege.
K. Thou hast bene long in sute,
To be installed Abbot of your house:
And in your fauour many friends haue stird.
Now is the hower that you shall be preferd,
Upon condition, and the matter small.
Short shrift to make, good honest Confessor,
I loue a faire Nunne, now in Dunmow Abbey.
The Abbesse loues you, and you pleasure her.
Now if, betweene you two, this prettie Ladie
Could be perswaded to affect a king,
Your sute is graunted; and on Dunmowe Abbey,
I will bestowe a hundred markes a yeare.
Mon. A holy Nunne, a young Nunne, and a Lady.
Deare ware my Lord; yet bid you well as may be:
Strike hands; a bargaine, she shall be your owne:
Or if she will not
Ki. Nay, if she doe refuse,
Ile send a deaths-man with you, this is hee:
If she be wilfull, leaue her to his hands:
And on her owne head be her hasted end.

Mon. The matter shall be done.
K. Sirra, what poysons haue you readie?
Brand. Store, store.
K. I waite on the monke then, and ere we take horse,
Ile giue you such instructions as you neede.
Hughbert, prepare to Windsor with our hoast.
Exit King, Monke.
Hu. Your tyrannies haue lost my loue almost:
And yet I cannot chuse but loue eternally
This wanton king, replcat with crueltie.
O how are all his princely vertues staind,
With lust abhorred and lasciuious heate?
Which kindling first to fire, nowe in a flame,
Shewes to the whole world clearely his fowle shame.
To quench this flame, full many a tide of teares,
Like ouerflowing full seas, haue bene spent:
And many a dry land drunke with humane blood;
Yet nothing helps his passions violent:
Rather they adde oyle to his raging fire,
Heate to his heate, desire to his desire,
Somewhat I feare, is now a managing.
For that prodigious bloodie stigmatique,
Is neuer cald vnto his kingly sight,
But like a Comet he portendeth still
Some innouation, or some monstrous act,
Cruell, vnkindly, horrid, full of hate:
As that vile deede at Windsor, done of late.
Gentle Matilda some what I mistrust:
Yet thee I neede not feare such is his loue;
Againe, the place doth giue thee warrantise:
Yet I remember when his Highnesse said,
The lustfull monke of Bury should him aid:
I so it is; if she haue any ill,
Through ylewd shaueling will her shame be wrought;
If it so chaunce, Matildaes guiltlesse woes

Will with the losse of many a life be bought.
But Hubert will be still his dread Lords friend,
Howeuer he deserues, his master serue:
Though he neglect, him will not I neglect:
Whoeuer failes him, I will Iohn affect.
For though kings fault in many a foule offence,
Subiects must sue, not mend with violence. Exit.

Enter Oxford, Queene.

Ox. Now by my faith, you are too blame Madame:
Euer tormenting euer vexing you?
Cease off these fretting humours, pray yee doe.
Griefe will not mend it, nought can pleasure you,
But patient suffering: nor by your Graces leaue,
Haue you such cause to make this hue and cry
After a husband; you haue not in good sooth.
Yearely a childe? this paiment is not bad.
Content faire Queene, and do not think it strange,
That kings doe sometimes seeke delight in change:
For now and then, I tell you, poore men range.
Sit downe a little, I will make you smile.
Though I be now like to the snowie Alpes,
I was as hot as AEtna in my youth:
All fire yfaith, true heart of oake, right steele,
A ruffian Ladie: often for my sport,
I to a lodge of mine did make resort.
To viewe my deere I said; deare God can tell,
It was my keepers wife, whome I lou'd well.
My Countesse (God be with her) was a shrowe,
As women be, your Maiestie doth knowe:
And some odde pickthanke put it in her head,
All was not well: but such a life I led,
And the poore keeper, and his smooth'd face wife,
That will I, nil I, there she might not bide:
But for the people I did well prouide:

And

And by gods mother, for my Ladies ſpight,
I tricke her in her kinde, I ſerv'd her right.
Were ſhe at London, I the country kept;
Come thither, I at London would ſojourne:
Came ſhe to court, from court I ſtraight way ſtept:
Return, I to the court would backe returne.
So this way, that way, every way ſhe went,
I ſtill was retrograde, ſtill oppoſite.
Till at the laſt, by mildeneſſe and ſubmiſſion,
We met, kiſt, joyn'd, and here left all ſuſpition.

Qu. Now out upon you Vere, I would haue thought,
The world had not contain'd a chaſter man.

Ox. Now, by my fay, I will be ſworne, I am.
In all I tell you, I confeſſe no ill,
But that I curſt a froward womans will:
Yet had my keepers wife bene of my minde,
There had bene cauſe ſome fault with vs to finde:
But I proteſt, her nose and napes were ſuch,
That for my life ſhe euer kept goe much.

Qu. You would take nap: but our king Iohn kaies no:
No nap, no anſwere will ſuffice his turne:
He, for he cannot tempt true chaſtitie,
Fills all the Land with hoſtile crueltie.
Is it not ſhame, he that ſhould punish ſinne,
Defend the righteous, helpe the innocent,
Carues with his ſworde, the purpoſe of his will,
Upon the guarders of the vertuous,
And hunts admired ſpotleſſe maiden-head,
With all the darts of deſolation,
Becauſe ſhe ſcorneth to be diſſolute.
We, that he leaues, I doe not murmur at:
That he loues her, doth no whit me perplex,
If ſhe did loue him, or my ſelfe did hate:
But this alone is it that me doth vex,
He leaues me that loues him, and her purſues,

That loath him and loues me: how can I chuſe,
But ſadly grieue, and mourne in my greene youth:
When not of her, nor mee he taketh ruthe.
Ox. Ha done, good Queene, for gods good loue, ha don.
This raging humour will no doubt be ſtaid.
Vertuous Matilda is profeſt a Nunne:
Within a mile, at Dunmow liues the maid:
God will not ſuffer any thing ſo vile:
Hee will not ſare, that he ſhould her defile.
Qu. Nor Church, nor chappell, Abbey, Nunry,
Are priuiledg'd from his intemperance.
But leaue we him, and let vs, I entreat,
Goe viſit faire Matilda: much I am
In debt vnto the maide.
Ox. You are indeede.
You wrongd her, when with biolses you made her bleed.
But if you pleaſe to viſit her, faire dame,
Our coach is readie: we will ſoone be there.
Qu. Thanks Oxford; and with vs I meane to beare
The beautious garland, ſent me out of Spaine:
Which I will offer in the Abbey chappell:
As witneſſe of Matildaes chaſtitie:
Whom while I liue, I euer vow to loue,
In recompence of raſh and cauſeleſſe wrong.

Enter Brand ſolus, with cuppe, bottle of poyſon.

Brand. Good, by this hand: exceeding, paſſing good.
The dog no ſooner dranke it, but, pugh, pugh quoth he:
So grins me with his teeth: lyes downe, and dies.
Pughſe quoth I: by gogs bloud goe thy waies:
Of all thy line and generation,
Was neuer dog ſo worthipt as thou art,
For ere thou di'dſt, thou wert an officer:
I ly not, by theſe nailes, a ſquires place:
For the vile cur became a counteſſe taſter.
So dyed the dog. Now in our next account

The

The Countesse comes, lets see a Countesse & a Nunne.
Why so: why so?
What would she haue the whole world quite vndone:
Weele meete her so: that trick. What, not a king?
Hanging's too good for her; I am but a plaine knaue,
And yet should any of these no forsooths,
These pray awayes, these trip and goes, these tits,
Deny mee: now by these:
A plague vpon this bottle and this cup:
I cannot act mine oath: but too't againe,
By these ten ends of flesh and blood, I sweare:
First with this hand, wound thus about her haire,
And with this dagger lustilie lambackt:
I would faith, I, by my villany,
I would: but here, but here she comes,
Led by two doctors in sweete letchery:
If they speede, with my popsou I goe by;
If not, haue at you maid: then steppe in I.

Enter Matilda, betweene the Monke and the Nunne.

Mon. And as I saide, faire maid, you haue done well,
In your distresse, to seeke this holy place:
But tell me truely, how doe you expell
The rage of lust-arising heat in you:
Ma By prayer, by fasting, by considering
The shame of ill, and meede of doing well.
Ab. But daughter, daughter, tell me in my eare,
Haue you no fleshly fightings now and then: whisper.
Brand. Fleshly quoth you: a maid of threescore yeares,
And fleshly fightings sticking in her teeth:
Well wench, th'art matcht y faith.
Ab. You doe confesse the king hath tempted you,
And thinking now and then on gifts and state,
A glowing heat hath proudly puft you vp:
But thanks to God, his Grace hath done you good.

Mon. Who, the kings Grace?
Ma. No: Gods Grace, holy monke. (maid.
Mo. The kings Grace faine would do you good, faire
Me. Ill good: he meanes my fame to violate.
Ab. Well, let that be.
Br. Good bauld, good mother B.
How faine you would that that good deed should be?
Ab. I was about to say some what vpon a thing. O thus
We maids that all the day are occupied, (it is.
In labour and chaste hallowed exercise,
Are nothing so much tempted while day lasts,
As we are tried and proued in the night.
Tell mee Maulda, had you since you came,
No dreames, no visions, nothing worth the note?
Ma. No, I thanke God.
Ab. Truly you will, you will;
Except you take good heede and bleſſe your ſelfe.
For if I lie but on my backe a while,
I am pait recouery, ſure of a bad dreame.
You ſee you reuerend Monke now God he knowes,
I loue him dearer for his holineſſe:
And I beleeue the diuell knowes it too:
For the foule fiend comes to me many a night,
As like the monke, as if he were the man.
Many a hundred nights, the Nuns haue ſeene:
Pray, cry, make croſſes, doe they what they can.
Once gotten in, then doe I fall to worke,
My holy water bucket being neere hand,
I whiſper ſecret ſpelles, and coniure him,
That the foule fiend hath no more powre to ſtand:
He downe, as I can quickly get him laid,
I bleſſe my ſelfe, and like a holy maid,
Turne on my right ſide: where I ſleepe all night,
Without more dreames, or troubling of the ſpright.
Bran. An Abbeſſe by the croſſe of my good blade,

An excellent mother to bring vp a maid,
For mee I meane, and my good master, Iohn:
But neuer any for an honest man. Coughs.
Now fie vpon that word of honestie:
Passing my throat, 'thad almost choked me:
Sblood Ile forsweare it for this tricke.
Mon. We trifle time. Faire maid, its thus in briefe.
This Abbey by your meanes may haue reliefe:
An hundred markes a yeare; answere I pray,
What will you doe herein?
Ma. Euen all I may.
Ab. Its charitably spoken, my faire childe:
A little thing of yours, a little helpe
Will serue the turne, learne but to beare, to beare
The burden of this world, and it will doe.
Bra. Well goe thy waies: Is this no baud think you?
Ma. Madam, the heauie burden of the world
Hath long oppreſt mee.
Ab But not preſt you right:
Now shall you beare a burden farre more light.
Ma. What burden bearing? wherto tends this talke?
Mon. To you, to vs, this Abbey and King Iohn,
Me. O God forefend he should be thought vpon.
Mon. Lady make short, the King must lie with you.
Ma. With me, with me?
First turns to the Monke, then to the Abbesse.
Ab. Sweete neuer looke so strange:
He shall come closely, no bodie shall see.
Ma. How can he come, but one hath eyes to see?
Mon. Your chamber windowes shall be shadowed.
Mat. But no vaile from my conscience shadowes me.
Ab. And all the Nunnes sent quietly to bed.
Ma. But they will rise, and, by my blushing red,
Quickly giue guesse of my lost maidenhead.
Bra. She goes yfaith, by God she is their owne.
Mo. Be not so nice, the sin is veniall:

Considering you yield for charitie,
And by your fall, the Nunnery shall rise.
Ab. Regard good counsell daughter, pray be wise.
Mon. Come, here's a stirre: will doe wench: will it do?
Ab. Say I, say I, forget the sound of no:
Or else say no and take it: wilt thou so?
Mar. Doe you intend thus lewdely as you speake?
Br. I by gogs bloode do they: a moppet, you were best
To take their proffers, least if they forsake you,
I play the diuels part, step in and take you.
Mat. Some holy water, helpe me blessed Nunnes.
Two damn'd spirits, in religious weeves,
Attempt to tempt my spotlesse chastitie:
And a third diuell gaping for my soule,
With horrid starings, gastly frighteth me.
Ab. You may call while you will: but maid list what
Or be assur'd this is your dying day. (we say,
Drawes a Crucifix.
Mat. In his name that did suffer for my sinne,
And by this blessed signe, I coniure you:
Depart fowle fiends, returne from whence yee came:
Auoide yee fiends, and cease to trouble mee- (rer?
Brand. Sounds, she thinks vs diuels. Heare you coniu-
Except you vse that tricke, to coniure downe
The standing spirit of my Lord the King,
That your good mother there, the Abbesse vses,
To coniure downe the spirit of the Nonne,
Not all your crosses haue the power to blesse
Your bodie from a sharpe and speedie death.
Ma. Are yt not fiends, but mortall bodies then:
Feeles them all. (men.
Brand. Maid, maid: catch lower, when you feele poling
Sblood, I was neuer taken for the diuell till now?
Ma. O where shall chastitie haue true defence,
When Churchmen lay this siege to innocence?

Where

Where shall a maid haue certaine sanctuary,
When Ladie Lust rules all the Nunnery?
Now fie vpon yee bath, false seeming Saints,
Incarnate diuels, diuelish hypocrites.
A cowled Monke, an aged vailed Nunne,
Become base Pandars: and with lustful speach,
Assaie the chast eares of true maidenhead!
Now fie vpon this age, would I were deade.
Monk. Come leaue her Ladie; she shall haue her wish.
Ab. Sprede her I pray thee; should the baggage liue,
Sheele slaunder all the chaste Nunnes in the Land.

Exeunt Monke, Abbesse.

Bra. Well, well, goe get you two vnto your coniuring:
Let me alone to lap her on gods ground.
Ma. Why dost thou stay?
Bra. Why maid, because I must:
I haue a message to you from the king.
Ma. And thou art welcome to his humble maid,
I thought thee to be grim and fierce at first:
But now thou hast a sweete aspect, milde lookes.
Art thou not come to kill me from the king?
Brand. Yes.
Ma. And thou art welcom, euen the welcom'st man,
That euer came vnto a woefull maid.
Be briefe goodfellow: I haue in the world,
No goods to giue, no will at all to make:
But Gods will and the kings on me be done.
A little money kept to giue in almes,
I haue about mee, deaths-man take it all:
Thou art the last poore alms-man I shall see.
Come, come, dispatch: what weapon will death weare,
When he assailes mee? Is it knife, or sworde?
A strangling cord, or sodaine flaming fire?
Bran. Neither, thou manly maid: looke here, looke here:
A cup of poyson. Wherefore dost thou smile?

Mat. O God, in this the king is mercifull.
My deare lou'd Huntington by poyson dyed.
Good fellow, tell the king I thanke his Grace,
And doe forgiue his causelesse cruelitie.
I doe forgiue thee too; but doe aduise
Thou leaue this bloodie course, and seeke to saue
Thy soule immortall, closed in thy breast:
Giues it her.
Be briefe I pray thee: now to King Iohns health
A full carouse; and god remember not
The curse he gaue himselfe at Robins death,
Wishing by poyson he might end his life,
If euer he solicited my loue.
Farewell goodfellowe, now thy medicine worke,
And with the labour, I am forc'd to rest.
Bra. Foounds she cares not, she makes death a iest.
Ma. The guiltlesse feare not death. Farewel good friend
I pray thee be no trouble in my end.
He stands staring and quaking.
Enter Oxford, Queene, Abbesse, attendants.
Ox. And say you Ladie Abbesse that there came
One from the King vnto her? what was hee?
Ab. Ponder he stands, I know not what he is.
Still he stands staring.
Q. Iesus haue mercy. Oxford, come not nigh him.
Ox. Not nigh him Madame? yes: keepe you away.
Ab. Come in good Queene: I doe not mean to stay.
Exit Ab.
Nay I to stirre, before I see the end.
Ox. Why staredst thou thus? speake fellow, answer me,
Who art thou?
Bra. A bloodie villaine, and a murderer.
A hundred haue I slaine with mine owne hands.
Twas I that starued the Ladie Muse to death,
And her young sonne, at Windsor Castle late.

The

Tis I haue slaine Matilda, blessed maid,
And now will hurry to damnations mouth,
Fast by the gnawing worme of conscience dwelling in,
Ox. Hold him for gods sake: stay the desperate wretch.
Ma. O some good pitying man compassionate
That wretched man, so woefull desperate:
Saue him for gods sake: he hath set me free,
From much worlds woe, much wrong, much miserie.
Qu. I heare thy tongue, true perfect charitie.
Chaste maide, faire maide, looke vp and speake to mee.
Ma. Whose here? my gracious soueraigne Isabell?
I will take strength and kneele. girle,
Qu. Matilda sit, Ile kneele to thee. Forgiue me, gētle
My most vngentle wrongs.
Ma. Faire beautious Queene,
I giue god thankes, I doe not thinke on wrongs.
Ox. How now Fitzwaters childe? how doest thou girle?
Ma. Well, my good Lord of Oxford: prettie well:
A little trauell more, and I shall rest:
For I am almost at my iourneyes end.
O that my head were rais'd a little vp:
My drouslie head, whose dim decaying lights;
Assure me it is almost time to sleep.
Raise her heade.
I thanke your Highnesse, I haue now some ease.
Be witnesse, I beseech your Maiestie,
That I forgiue the King, with all my heart:
With all the little of my liuing heart,
That giues me leaue to say, I can forgiue:
And I beseech high heauen he long may liue
A happie King, a king beloou'd and fear'd,
Oxford, for gods sake, to my father write
The latest commendations of his childe:
And say, Matilda kept his Honours charge,
Dying a spotlesse maiden vndefilde,

Bid him be glad, for I am gone to ioy:
I that did turne his weale to bitter woe:
The king and he will quickly now growe friends,
And by their friendshippe much content will growe,
Sinke earth to earth, fade flower, ordaind to fade:
But passe forth soule vnto the shrine of peace,
Beg there attonement may be quickly made.
Faire Queene, kinde Oxford, all good you attend:
Fly forth my soule, heauens king be there thy friend.
Ox. O pittie, mourning sight, age pittilesse:
Are these themessages king Iohn doth send?
Keepe in, my teares, for shame, your conduits keepe,
Sad woe beholding eyes: no, will ye not?
Why, then a Gods name weepe. Sit.
Qu. I cannot weepe for wrath: here, here, take in
The blessed bodie of this noble maid:
In milke white cloathing let the same be laid,
Exeunt with the bodie.
Vpon an open biere, that all may see
King Iohns vnkingly lust and crueltie.
Ox. I, be it so. Your selfe, if so you please,
Will I attend vpon, and both vs waite
On chast Matildaes bodie: which with speede,
To Windsor Castle we will hence conuey:
There is another spectacle of ruth,
Old Bruses famisht Ladie and her sonne.
Qu. There is the king besieging of young Bruse,
His Lords are there: who when they see this sight,
I know will haue small heart for Iohn to fight.
Ox. But where's the murderer, ha? is not he staid?
Ser. Borne with a violent rage, he climd a tree,
And none of vs could hinder his intent:
But getting to the top boughes, fast he tied
His garters to his necke, and a weake branch,
Which being vnable to sustaine his weight,

Downe

Downe to the ground he fell, where bones and flesh
Lie paſht together, in a poole of bloode,
Ox. Alas for woe; but this is iuſt heauens doome
On thoſe that liue by bloode: in bloode they die.
Pay an example of it, honeſt friends,
Doe well, take paines, beware of crueltie,
Come Madam, come, to Windſor let vs goe:
And there to Brutes griefe, adde greater woe. Exeunt.

Enter Bruſe, vpon the walles.

Bru. Will not my bitter bannings and ſad plaints,
My ſuit and execrable execrations,
My teares, my prayers, my pittie-mouing mones
Preuaile, thou glorious bright Lampe of the day,
To cauſe thee keepe an obit for their ſoules,
And dwell one month with the Antipodes?
Bright ſunne retire, glide not this vault of death,
With thy illuſtrate raies: retyre, retyre,
And yield black night thy Emperye a while:
Alittle while, till as my teares be ſpent,
My bloode be likewiſe ſhed in raining drops,
By the tempeſtuous rage of tyrant Iohn.
Learne of thy loue, the morning: ſhe hath wept,
Shower vpon ſhower, of ſiluer dewie teares.
High trees, lowe plants, and prettie little flowers
Witneſſe her woe: on them her griefe appeares:
And as ſhee dropes on them, they doe not let,
By droppe and droppe, their mother earth to wet.
See theſe hard ſtones, how faſt ſmall rouclets
Iſſue from them, though they ſeeme iſſueleſſe:
And wet eyed woe on euery thing is viewed:
Saue in thy face that ſmil'ſt at my diſtreſſe.
O doe not drinke their teares thus greedily:
Yet let the mornings mourning garment dwell
Vpon the ſad earth. Wilt thou not, thou churle?

Then surfet with thy exhalations speedily:
For all earths venemous infecting wormes
Haue belcht their severall poysons on the fields,
Wiring their simples in thy compound draught.
Well Phœbus well, drinke on I say, drinke on:
But when thou dost vngorge thee, grant me this,
Thou power those poysons on the head of Iohn.

Drum. Enter Chester, Mowbray, Souldiers: Lester, Richmond at an other: Souldiers.

Bru. How now my Lords: were ye last night so pleas'd
With the beholding of that propertie,
Which Iohn and other murderers haue wrought,
Upon my starued mother and her sonne:
That you are come againe: Shall I againe
Set open shop, shew my dead ware, deare bought,
Of a relentlesse merchant that doth trade
On the red sea, twoine mightie with the bloud
Of noble, vertuous, harmelesse innocents:
Whose cole black vessell is of Ebonie,
Their shroods & tackle (wrought & wou'n by wrong)
Stretcht with no other gale of winde, but griefe:
Whose sighes with full blasts beateth on her shroods:
The Master murder is, the Pilot shame,
The Mariners rape, theft, and periury:
The burden, tyrannous oppression,
Which howerly he in England doth vnlade:
Say, shall I open shop, and shewe my wares?
Lest. No, good Lord Bruse, we haue enough of that.
Drum: Enter king, Hubert, Souldiers.
Ki. To Windsor welcome, Hubert: Soft me thinks
Bruse and our Lords are at a parly now?
Br. Chester and Mowbray, you are Iohns sworn friends:
Will you see more? Speake, answere me my Lords:

I am no niggard, you shall haue your fill.
Both. We haue too much, and surfet with the wot.
Br. Are you all full? Here comes a rauening kite,
That both at quick, at deade, at all will smite.
He shall, he must, I, and bir Lady, may
Commaund me to giue ouer holy day,
And set wide open, what you would not see
Ki. Why stand ye Lords, and see this traitour pearcht,
Upon our Castles battlements so proude?
Come downe young Bruse, set ope the castle gates:
Unto thy soueraigne, let thy knee be bow'd,
And mercie shall be giuen to thee and thine.
Br. O miserable thing:
Comes mercie from the mouth of Iohn our king?
Why then belike hell will be pittifull.
I will not ope the gates, the gate I will:
The gate where thy shame, and my sorrowe sits.
See my dead mother, and her famisht sonne:
Open thy tyrants eyes: for to the world,
I will lay open thy fell cruelties.
K. We heard indeede, thy mother and her sonne
In prison dyed, by wilfull famishment.
Br. Sinne doubled vpon sin. Slaunderst thou the dead?
Unwilling willingnesse it shall appeare,
By then I haue produc't, as I will doe,
The iust presumptions gainst your vniust act.
K. Assaile the castle Lords: Alarum drums:
And drown this scrietchowls cryes wt your deep sounds.
Lest. I tell thee drummer, if thy drum thou smite,
By heauen, Ile send thy soule to hels darke night.
Hence with thy drum: gods passion, get thee hence:
Be gone I say, moue not my patience. Exit drum.
K. Are you aduised Lester, what you doe?
Lest. I am aduised: for my Soueraigne knowe,
Ther's not a Lord here will lift vp his arme,

Against the person of your noble youth,
Till you haue heard the circumstantiall truth,
By good presumptions, touching this foule deede.
Therefore goe on young Bruse, proceede, refell
The allegation that puts in this doubt,
Whether thy mother through her wilfulnesse,
Famisht her selfe and her sweete sonne, or no:
Bru. Unlikely supposition: nature first denies,
That any mother, when her youngling cryes,
If she haue meanes, is so vnnaturall
To let it faint and starue. But we will proove
She had no meanes; except this monefull meane,
This torture of her selfe. Come forth, come forth,
Sir William Blunt, whome flaunder saies I slewe:
Come tell the king and Lords what you know true.
King. Thou hast betraid our Castle. (report,
Blunt. No: God can tell it was surpriz'd by politicke
And affirmation that your Grace was slaine.
Rich. Good, sir William Blunt:
Passe briefely to the Ladies famishment.
Bl. About some ten daies since, there came one Brand,
Bringing a signet from my Lord the king,
And this commission signed with his hand,
Lords looke, and reade the thing.
Commaunding me (as the contents expresse)
That I should presently deliuer vp
The Ladie Bruse and her young sonne to him.
Mow. What time a day was this?
Bl. It was, Lord Mowbray, some what past eleauen:
For we were euen then sitting downe to dine.
Lest. But did yee dine?
Bl. The Ladie and her sonne did not:
Brand would not stay.
Bru. No Lester, no: for here is no such signe
Of any meats digesture.

Rich.

Rich. But by the way. Tell vs I pray you Blunt,
While he remained with you, was the distraught
With griefe, or any other passions violent?
Blu. She now and then would weepe, & often pray,
For reconcilement twixt the king and Lords.
Chest. How to her sonne did she affected stand?
Blu. Affection could not any more affect:
Nor might a mother shewe more mothers loue.
Mowb. How to my Lord the king? (king more:
Bl. O my Lord God! I neuer knewe a subiect loue
She neuer would blin telling how his Grace
Sau'd her young sonne from souldiers, & from fire:
How faire he spake, gaue her her sonne to keepe:
And then, poore Ladie, she would kisse her boy,
Pray for the king so hearty earnestly,
That in pure zeale, she wept most bitterly.
K. I weepe for her, and doe by heauen protest,
I honour'd Bruses wife. How ere that slaue
Rudely effected what I rashly wild:
Yet when he came againe, and I bethought,
What bitter pennance I had put them to,
For my conceiu'd displeasure gainst old Bruse,
I bad the villaine poste and beare them meat:
Which he excus'd, protesting pittie mou'd him
To leaue wine, bread, and other powdred meate,
More than they twaine could in a fortnight eate.
Blu. Indeede, this can I witnesse with the king.
Which argues in that point his innocence:
Brand did beare in a months prouision;
But lockt it like a villaine, farre from them:
And lockt them in a place where no mans eare
Might heare their lamentable wofull mones:
For all the issue both of vent and light,
Came from a louer at the towers toppe,
Till now Lord Bruse made open this wide gappe.

Br. Had I not reason, thinke you, to make wilde
The windowe that should let so much woe forth?
Where sits my mother martyrde by her selfe,
Hoping to saue her childe from martyrdome:
Where stands my brother martyrd by himselfe,
Because he would not taste his mothers bloud.
For thus I gather this: my mothers teeth and chin
Are bloudy with the sauage cookery,
Which her soft heart, through pittie of her sonne,
Respectlesse, made her practise on her selfe:
And her right hand, with offring it the child,
Is with her owne pure bloud staind and defilde.
My little brothers lips and chin alone,
Are tainted with the bloud: but his cauen teeth,
Like orient pearle, or snowe-white puory,
Haue not one touch of bloud, one little spot:
Which is an argument the boy would not
Once stir his lips, to tast that bloudy foode,
Our cruell gentle mother ministred:
But as it seem'd (for see, his prettie
Palme is bloody too) he cast it on the ground:
For on this side these blessed reliques lye,
By famines rage diuided from this shrine,
Sad wofull mother in Ierusalem,
Who when thy sonne and thou didst faint for foode,
Burped his sweete flesh in thy hungry wombe:
How mercilesse wert thou, if we compare
Thy fact and this? For my poore Ladie mother
Did kill her selfe, to saue my dying brother.
And thou vngentle sonne of Miriam,
Why didst thou beg life when thy mother lackt?
My little brother George did nobly act
A more couragious part; he would not eat,
Nor beg to liue, it seem'd he did not cry:
Fewe teares stand on his cheeke, smooth is each eye:

But

But when he sawe my mother bent to die,
He dyed with her: O childish valiancie!
Kin-Good Bruse haue done: my heart can not containe
The griefe it holds, my eyes must thoure down raine.
Lest. Which showers are euen as good,
As raine in harueſt, or a ſwelling floode
When neighbouring medowes lack the mowers ſithe.

¶ A march for buriall, with drum and fife. Enter Oxford, Matilda borne with Nuns, one carrying a white pendant. These words writ in golde; Amoris, Caſtitatis, & Honoris honos. The Queene following the Biere, carrying a Garland of flowers: ſet it in the midſt of the Stage.

Rich. Liſt Leſter, hearſt thou not a mournfull march?
Leſt. Yes Richmond, and it ſeemeth old de Vere.
Ox. Lords, by your leaue, is not our ſoueraign here?
K. Yes good old Awbury.
Ox. Ah my gratious Lord,
That you ſo much your high ſtate ſhould neglect!
Ah god in heauen forgiue this bloudie deede,
Young Bruſe, young Bruſe, I weepe,
Thy mothers and thy brothers wrong:
Yet to afflict thee more, more griefe I bring.
Br. O honourable Awbery de Vere,
Let ſorrow in a ſable ſute appeare:
Doe not miſshape her garments, like delight,
If it be griefe, why cloth'ſt thou her in white?
Ox. I cannot tell thee yet: I muſt ſit downe.
Attend young Bruſe, and liſten to the Queene:
Sheele not be tongue tyed, we ſhall haue a ſtierne
Anone, I feare, would make a man halfe ſicke.
Qu. Are you here leaſt her? O intemperate king,

Wilt thou not ſee mee? come, come, ſhewe your face:
Your Graces graceleſſe, kings, vnkingly face.
What: mute, hands folded, eyes fixt on the earth?
Whyle turne is next now to be murdered?
The famiſht Bruſes are on ponder ſide:
On this another, I will name anone:
One for whole head this garland I doe beare,
And this faire milke-white ſpotleſſe pendant too.
Looke vp king Iohn, ſee, ponder ſits thy ſhame:
Ponder it lyes: what, muſt I tell her name?
It is Matilda, poyſoned by thee.

Ki. Matilda: O that foule ſwift footed ſlaue,
That kils ere one haue time to bid him ſaue.
Faire gentle girle, vngently made away.

Br. Thy baniſht vncles daughter, art thou there?
Then I defie all hope, and ſweare
Leſt. Stay Bruſe, and liſten wel what oath to ſwear.
Lewys the Dolphin, pitying our eſtate,
Is by the Chriſtian king his father, ſent
With aid to helpe vs, and is landed too.
Lords that will fly the venne of cruelty,
And fight to free your ſelues from tyranny,
Bruſe, keepe that Caſtle, to the only vſe
Of our elected king, Lewys of Fraunce.

Oxf. Gods paſſion doe not ſo: king Iohn is here,
Lords, whiſper not with Leſter. Leſter, fie:
Stir not againe regardleſſe mutinie:
Speake to them Hugh: I know thou louſt the king.

Madame, goe to them, nay doe, for gods ſake doe:
Downe with your ſtomacke: for if he goe downe,
You muſt downe too, and be no longer Queene:
Aduiſe you, goe intreat them ſpeedily.

Thy ſoueraigne, wherefore ſit you ſighing there?
The Lords are all about to follow Lewys:
Vp and intreat them, els they will away.

Kin.

K. Good Oxford let them goe. Why should they stay?
Ox. What? are you desperate? that must not be,
Heare me my Lords.
All stand in Counsell.
Ki. This pendant let mee see.
Amoris, Castitatis, & Honoris honos.
She was indeede of London the honour once,
When she was lou'd of vertuous Huntington:
Of chastitie the honour, all her life:
To impure thoughts she neuer could be wonne.
And she of Honour was the honour too,
By birth, in life, the honour honoured.
Bring in two tapers lighted, quick, dispatch.
Lest. Remember Bruse, thy charge. Come Lords away.
All, but Oxford and Hugh.
Away, wee will away.
Bring in two white Tapers.
Ox. Harke Lester but one word, a little stay.
Helpe mee good Hubert, helpe me gentle Queene.
Againe conferre.
K. How dim these Tapers burne? they giue no light.
Here were two beautious Lamps, y could haue taught
The Sunne to shine by day, the Moone by night:
But they are dim too: cleane extinguished.
Away with these, filth those faire lights be dead.
Ox. And as I say, harke Bruse vnto our talke.
Thinke you it is for loue of England, Lewis comes?
Nay: Fraunce is not so kinde: I would it were.
Aduise your selues; harke, dost thou heare me Bruse?
Br. Oxford, I doe.
Ox. Can noble English hearts beare the French yoke?
No Lester: Richmond thinke on Lewys sire,
That let't you, and your king, in Palestine.
Qu. And think beside, you know not Lewys nature,
Who may be as bad as Iohn, or rather worse than he.

nu. And looke my Lords vpon his silent woe:
His soule is at the doore of death I knowe.
See how he seekes to suck, if he could drawe,
Poyson from dead Matildaes albie lips.
Ile be sworne his very heart strings nips.
A vengeance on that slaue, that cursed Brand,
Ile kill him if I liue, with this right hand.

Ox. Thou canst not Hubert, he hath kild himselfe:
But to our matter. Lester. pray thee speake.
Young Bruse, for gods sake let vs knowe thy minde.

Bru. I would be loath to be a strangers slaue.
For Englands loue, I would no French king haue.

Lest. Well Oxford, if I be deceiu'd in Iohn againe,
Its long of you, Lord Hubert, and the Queene.
Yield vp the Castle Bruse, weele once more try
King Iohns proceedings. Oxford, tell him so.

Oxford goes to the king, does his duety, and talkes with him.

Br. I will come downe: but first farewell dear mother.

Kisse her.

Farewell poore little George, my pretty brother.
Now will I shut my chambles in againe.
Farewell, farewell.
In euerlasting blisse pour sweete soules dwell.

Ox. But you must mend y faith, in faith you must.

Lest. My Lord, once more pour subiects do submit,
Beseeching you to thinke how things haue past,
And let some comfort shine on vs pour friends,
Through the bright splendour of pour vertuous life.

K. I thanke you all; and Lester I protest,
I will be better than I yet haue beene.

Br. Of Windsor Castle here the keyes I yield.

K. Thanks Bruse: forgiue mee, and I pray thee see
Thy mother and thy brother buried,

Bruse offers to kisse Matilda.

In

In Windſor Caſtle Church, Doe, kiſſe her cheeke:
Weepe thou on that, on this ſide I will weepe.
O Chaſte virgine, thus I crowne thee wᵗ theſe flowers.
K. Let vs goe on to Dunmow with this maid:
Among the hallowed Nunnes let her be laide:
Unto her toombe, a monthly pilgrimage
Doth king John vowe in penance for this wrong
Goe forward maids: on with Matildaes herſe,
And on her Toombe ſee you ingraue this verſe;
Within this Marble monument, doth lye
Matilda martyrde, for her chaſtitie. Exeunt.

Epilogus.

Thus is Matildaes ſtory ſhowne in act,
And rough hewen out by an vncunning hand:
Being of the moſt materiall points compackt,
That with the certainſt ſtate of truth doe ſtand.
